Another image portrayed by American leftists that the current Sandinistas are very popular and that continuation of "the revolution" will be beneficial can be easily disputed. First, religious freedom has been attacked by the Sandinistas ever since their rise to power in 1979. One example involves the persecution of the Jewish community. The PLO provided the training and supplies, and the Sandinistas adopted their ideology and tactics. The Sandinistas then proceeded to harass and arrest the Jews, issuing death threats, confiscating businesses and private property, and ultimately torching their Managua synagogue. In the end, the Sandinistas forced every Jewish family into exile; even today, the totalitarian policies of the FSLN are still strong enough to repress any attempts at developing a Jewish community in Nicaragua.

The widespread discontent and unpopularity with the Sandinista regime is evident in the mass exodus of Nicaraguans into other countries. More than 500,000 Nicaraguans (a full 20 percent of the population) have fled since 1979; and, according to The Tico Times (Cost Rica's largest English newspaper), about 300,000 of them have settled in Costa Rica. On September 21, 1984, The Tico Times carried a story about 12 Nicaraguan students who managed to escape across the Nicaraguan border into Costa Rica, where they asked for political asylum. This is just one example among thousands that show us how the Nicaraguan people really feel about the Sandinista rule.

And what about the brutal treatment of the Nicaraguan Indian peoples? American leftists do, indeed, find this "unfortunate," but then dismiss this case of government oppression in the name of furthering the cause of "the revolution." In fact, some 43,000 of the 165,000 Miskito, Sumo, and Rama people along the eastern coast are now either in Sandinista-controlled concentration camps or in Honduras or Costa Rica as refugees. Another 5,000 have joined the FDN contra force in the north in the fight against their ruthless Sandinista rulers. In addition, according to many journalists who have travelled with the guerrillas, more than half the Indian villages have been destroyed by the Sandinistas; massive military battalions with heavy air power sweep through the Indian territory, destroying everything in their path.

In short, what has been said here are only a very few of the examples illustrating Sandinista brutality and deceitful propaganda; what still needs to be discussed are the farcical Nicaraguan elections. The ultimate goal of these investigations is to force the leftists to abandon their view that "revolution," solely for the sake of revolution, is beneficial. For promoting your "progress" is sheer hypocrisy when that "progress" results in the total destruction of human rights, civil liberties, and respect for the individuality of every human being.

Already 12 years have passed since I last swam at Wollaston Beach. Already hundreds, perhaps thousands of children have been denied the joys that I had living so close to the beach. Already real estate values have dropped for those homes which sit across the boulevard from what was once a beach but is now a cesspool.

The beach that was

Andrew M. Paven

When I was young we lived near the beach. And in the summer the cars of those who came to the beach would line either side of Fenno Street along the half-mile back from the beach to our house.

But we were lucky and I, with my mother and father and two older sisters, and of course pail and shovel in tow, could walk to the beach to spend the day enjoying the sun and the small waves and the view of the Boston skyline in the distance.

The beach is Wollaston Beach, in Quincy, on Quincy Bay, part of Boston Harbor. And Wollaston Beach in those days of my childhood was a two-mile strip of sand that was full of people from north to south, full with children and parents and elderly.

The world's first Howard Johnson's was across the boulevard and about a half-mile north of where my family regularly sat, at the Fenno Street light. And men with white suits and cooler chests hanging from their necks would walk the beach and sell ice cream treats to all those children who were sufficiently persuasive (creamsicles were my mother's favorite). And the Red Cross would give swimming lessons in the frigid water.

But I stopped going to Wollaston Beach around the age of 12 (1972), because the beach had become dirty. It was obvious to me and my friends and, I think, to anyone who had watched the beach over the years. It was almost 10 years later that Wollaston Beach was first closed because of the pollution. But we didn't need scientific proof. Ten years before we had trusted our eyes and our noses.

I tell this story because last Thursday Massachusetts Superior Court Judge Paul Garrity placed the Metropolitan District Commission — the overseer of Boston Harbor's sewerage treatment facilities — into court receivership because the State Legislature had failed to act on the problem of setting up a commission to remedy the mess that is Boston Harbor.

The remedy is expensive, estimated at one billion dollars. Hundreds of leaking pipes must be replaced and both the Deer Island (in Winthrop) and the Nut Island (in Quincy) treatment plants must be rebuilt. The issue has become a political football because approving the remedy will raise taxes, and right now few legislators seem willing to do that.

But something must be done. Judge Garrity appointed a fact-finding commission last year headed by Harvard Law School Prof. Charles M. Haar, and among the commission's findings of fact was this: "In the first five months of 1983 alone, "863 million gallons of grossly polluted brown fluid" poured into the harbor.

Already 12 years have passed since I last swam at Wollaston Beach. Already hundreds, perhaps thousands of children have been denied the joys that I had living so close to the beach. Already real estate values have dropped for those homes which sit across the boulevard from what was once a beach but is now a cesspool. Already shellfish diggers must find somewhere else to go or go broke.

Chairman of the Massachusetts House Ways and Means Committee — whence the legislative proposals never escaped — Michael Creedon (D-Brockton), says of Judge Garrity's order: "I have a belief about court orders. I ignore them."

I have a belief about flippant legislators who refuse to take this issue seriously: They should be forced to swim in the swill that is Quincy Bay and Boston Harbor. And I have a belief about Judge Paul Garrity: He will not abdicate receivership until something is done to clean up the water. He and his plans deserve support.

A stand for life...for caring

We are dying. Every week in this state alone many of our age group are killed or have killed in alcohol-related accidents. We are angered at legislation that we see as taking away our freedoms such as raising the drinking age and eliminating happy hours. We do not, however, get too upset that in any given weekend our peers in Boston, Chatham or Chicopee are dying in alcohol-related accidents. We do not care. If this seems difficult for our socially conscious, open minds to accept, tough luck. The truth is that most of us have many chances to stop a drunk friend from driving or controlling the liquor that we consume or that is consumed in our homes. We simply do not care.

"It feels good to get drunk."

"They'll think I'm getting on their case if I tell them not to drive drunk."

"No one will hang out with me if I don't offer alcohol (or drugs) at my party."

"I'm not really comfortable with myself unless I have a beer in my hand."

Grow up, friends. These are just excuses and pretty poor ones at that.

Like so many others I have experienced the death of good friends as the result of drunk driving. Three years later it still hurts. I have lost people who called themselves my friends because of some of these opinions. That is too bad. I want to make a stand for life. How about you? Do you care?

Letters to the Editor

Things are not always as they appear to be

I would like to apologize for the incorrect statement I made in my column, "Apathy in a Time of Need" in Thursday's Collegian referring to my next door neighbor. He did not step over me on the floor. I intended the statement to read, "His apathetic attitude was as if he stepped over me." Again I apologize for the misrepresentation.

Scots a-singing

By ADAM BRIGHTMAN

Hurray! Hurray! More of the same! Although much critical ado and brou-ha-ha has greeted Big Country since their debut in the U.S.A., I felt no need to jump upon the wagon and credit them with Clash-size achievements.

I do, however, applaud this album, Steeltown, for many of the same reasons as the debut. The best cuts succeed through a winning melody sent marching forward on the back of a crunching and stinging guitar attack. On the worst cuts, however, the melodies and arrangements just do not command my attention so. I begin to notice how weak Stuart Adamson's vocals sound or what the band needs to carry that song through.

When I skip around, though, it is because I so wildly love four or five of the fast ones and not because I loathe the other five. In fact, I can spin this record while I'm busy reading or something and quite enjoy the whole thing. Some of the songs just seem a bit lackluster.

Lyrically, Stuart Adamson reads like crafted poetry with the flavor of old Scotland, I suppose. In other words, it pleases the soul without necessarily exciting it. Kind of like Irish Spring. Chariots of Fire, and the guy from Star Trek all rolled up in one, only you can't hear his accent. This coupled with the whining bag-pipe guitar march gives me a feeling of, well, "gusto." The songs are mainly stories, or rather, tales relating to war ("Where the Rose is Sown") or politics ("Flame of the West") or industry ("Steeltown") in a romantic but peace-loving way.

I wish Big Country would come up with an entire album of songs like the aforementioned ones and even a couple of big hits as on their debut, but for now I an content with "Steeltown" for thoughtful, exultant entertainment.

Hot Toasters cook

By BRADFORD VERTER
Collegian Staff

As if to fill the void left by the demise of the English Beat, numerous ska bands have recently popped up. Many of these are rather dull and flaccid, and fail to reach the standards of their predecessors. (One might say they're nothing Specials). The Toasters are an exception.

A new York based band, The Toasters have been appearing with increasing frequency on the club scene, and have created the soundtrack for Tag Ties, an independent film which appeared at Cannes this year. Their just-released single Beat Up on Icebear Records prove them to be a hot band on a cool label.

The two songs offered on the single are uniformly fast-paced and witty. "The Beat" on side A has particularly clever lyrics ("She lifted my spirits, and she lifted my wallet too—and then she left."), while side one's "Brixton Beat" is a more soulful street tough's soliloquy. Indeed, the only bad thing about the songs is that they end too soon.

The single is available for $3 from Breakfast Music, 295 East 8th St., NYC 10009. Be the first person in your dorm to own a copy. It's a social investment worth making, and you wouldn't want to be called a "cultural ostrich", would you?

Paul's home movie

By JULIE BENNETT
Collegian Staff

If you would like to see the McCartneys' and the Starrs' 'make believe' home movie, see Give My Regards to Broad Street. If you would like to see a good major motion picture, don't see it.

Broad Street is at best a series of mediocre to poor videos strung together by a thin plot. The songs are not new, except for "No More Lonely Nights," and include "Yesterday," "Silly Love Songs," "Eleanor Rigby," and "The Long and Winding Road."

The film consists of a day in the life of Paul McCartney. His day starts out badly, though, when Harry Torrington, the man entrusted with the newly finished master tape of McCartney's latest album, disappears. Everyone fears that since he is an ex-con, he has sold the tape on the black market. Paul doesn't want to believe this because he trusted Harry, but the prospect nonetheless haunts him in the form of bizarre daydream sequences. Meanwhile, Paul continues his life as a rock star: singing, recording, and doing interviews all day long.

There are interminable scenes of Paul rehearsing or recording totally unrelated songs. One of these video-like scenes in particular, Ballroom Dancing, is shockingly stupid and has sparing relevancy to anything else in the movie.

Linda McCartney, Ringo Starr and his wife Barabara Bach, all co-star, giving Broad Street a self-indulgent feel. Many of the minor characters were also portrayed by very amateurish actors resulting in the film's almost making fun of itself.

Blacks are an endangered species, court justice says

By MARYANN CASSELL
Collegian Staff

Although the development of the American law has been closely associated with Blacks, this ethnic group is discriminated against the most in the practice of law, thus creating a hostile environment, according to a New York Supreme Court Justice.

Speaking on Blacks in Law last evening at Amherst college, Bruce Wright said, "the law and its penalties based on race swing like a sardonic pendulum in America."

The Law is a white dominated institution that institutionalized racism in this country, and it is up to Blacks to teach white Americans the most humane aspect of the law. It is much too pale, he said.

"The flexibility of the law and its ability to embrace chicanery is constantly carried out throughout New York City and the courts pass it off with minor concern," he said.

He said Blacks have made a heroic effort to change American law during the decade of the 60s, "when we were told that we were illiterate and at the same time it was against the law to teach Blacks to read or write," he said.

"Thus, once again the Law is employed to protect the privileged position of the white male and to endanger whatever positions Blacks may have," Wright said.

"White American society is on its brink of its 19th century blemished ethnic for cutting Blacks' legs and then condemning us for not running 100 meters in ten seconds flat," he said. It is all part of the country's national ethnic and knee-jerking reactions to matters of race and aided by the Supreme Court," he said.

The theory of democracy, according to Wright is the inventions that are for those who came here, America is one of the greatest example of geological grand larceny known to the world, he said.

Speaking of police brutality he described Blacks as an endangered species. Quoting Jeane Kirkpatrick, when the media exposed her meeting with White South Africans in the U.S. she said 'racial dictatorship is better than communism,' to which Wright answered, this indeed makes us an endangered species," he said.

Committee rescinds motion

By KIMBERLY A. BURGE
Collegian Staff

A motion to have the New World Theater be funded by the Arts Council was rescinded in a secret ballot Sunday evening in a narrow margin of 5 to 4.

Presentations by Marilyn Bou and john Ruddock, external coordinators for the SGA's Third World Legislative Caucus, Majorie Tuttle from the Arts Council, and Roberta Uno-Thelwell artistic director of the New World Theater were the deciding factors in getting the motion rescinded.

The original motion called for all Fine and Performing Arts groups to be funded by the Arts Council. According to Tuttle, there was "no way to increase teh budget. If the motion hadn't been rescinded and the Arts Council had to provide the funds, other groups would have been cut and someone else would have been left out," she said.

In opposition to the original motion, Bou said "traditionally, the theater department has not been receptive to Third World students. The New World Theater is vital for students to get experience." The group has been a "model" RSO (Recognized Student Organization). In fact, their budget was increased $2,500 last year, she said. "I think it's ludicrous to compliment them one year and then have the audacity to cut funding the next," said Bou.

Gilbert Stair, a member of the SGA's Budget's Committee, was angry about the charges of racism leveled against the committee. "I was blown away by charges of racism." The committee said they weren't going to fund all fine and performing arts groups, not just the New World Theater, he said. "The botton line is that we will keep funding the art groups but they will get less and less money," he said.

The New World Theater was founded in 1979 to present theatrical works of Third World people and expand the cultural knowledge of the University community.

Swimmers aim for title

Craig Fuller: transfer gives UM big hopes

By STUART GOTTLIEB
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's swim team has a big surprise in store for its competition this season.

He's Iowa transfer Craig Fuller. The Minutemen's "secret weapon" has let UMass realistically set its goal as the Division 1 New England championship after a 6-4 season last year and sixth place finish in the region. Defending champ Williams College (five years running) has reason to be worried the Minutemen will be that good.

Fuller, originally from Belmont, Mass., was recruited by the Hawkeyes out of Belmont High after an All-American career during which he shattered records and qualified eight times for the senior national meet.

Fuller, who says he's basically a 200 yard swimmer because, "distances are better for me than sprints," broke the UMass 200 fly record (held by present teammate Chris Clarke) with a 1:56.83 in his first meet on Saturday against Lowell.

Clarke later called Fuller, "the best in New England," after seeing his school record broken.

Fuller has done a 1:49.6 in the event and a 1:42.8 in the 200 yard freestyle. His 200 butterfly time qualified for the Olympic Trials.

His transfer from Iowa, a Big 10 swimming power, to UMass served two purposes: to get closer to home and to escape the pressure the hawkeye coaches imposed.

"The coaches stressed swimming a lot more than academics," Fuller, a junior sociology major said.

"At UMass swimming has become more fun. Russ (UMass coach Russ Yarworth) is a great guy, and not only does he stress academics as being of equal importance as swimming, but even more so," said Fuller, who is also minoring in athletic coaching.

Fuller has been hampered by a shoulder injury but does not feel it will affect his goals of "taking two events at both the New Englands and the Atlantic 10 competitions and hopefully contributing to UMass' doing well in both."

Yarworth, who called Fuller the best swimmer he has ever coached, said that "sometimes he lets his shoulder problems frustrate him and he doesn't keep perspective of his goals, which are endless."

"Until Craig came to UMass we were just another New England team, now the division title is within reach," Yarworth said.

The UM coach also announced that another Iowa swimmer, freestyler Drew Donovan, will attend UMass after quitting Iowa two years ago. A strong swimmer, Donovan will help greatly in getting UMass the New England title.

"We have a real good shot at the New England title," Yarworth said. "But I won't be displeased if we finished third or fourth as long as my guys give it their best shot."

If UMass gives it its best shot, the New England title, which hasn't resided in Amherst in close to 50 years, will have a new home.

Women swimmers drop fourth straight at springfield

Feinberg wins two events

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

Despite two victories from senior Elizabeth Feinberg, the University of Massachusetts women's swim team continued to struggle, losing to Springfield College 86-53 on Saturday.

The women, 0-4 on the season, won only four events as the Chiefs dominated the meet. Feinberg, who is undefeated in individual races this season, won both the 50 yard freestyle (:25.85) and the 100 yard freestyle (:56.63). She is 10-0 in freestyles this season.

Margaret Cameron took the 200 freestyle with a 2:05.26 with the 400 freestyle relay team of Lori McCluskey, Sue Kane, Allison Uzzo and Liz Feinberg turning in a time of 3:57.19.

In other results, Uzzo was second in the 1,000 with a 11:06.61, the medley relay broke two minutes for the first time, Rosie Feitelberg took third in the 200 butterfly, Stephens was second.

Liz Barrett clocked a 2:52.03 in the 200 breaststroke, seven seconds better than her previous lifetime best. Maura Skelley had a good time of 2:24.25 in the 200 individual medley.

"We're improving, but it's taking sometime," UMass coach Bob Newcombe said. "We'll be going for times against Main on Sunday."

The Bears, New England champs for the last three years, will face UMass at Boyden at noon on Sunday.

Georgetown still reigns

Hoyas destroy weak foes, remain undefeated

Georgetown remained atop the Associated Press' Top Twenty Monday as the defending national champions received 55 of 58 first-place votes in the nationwide balloting of sports writers and broadcasters.

The Hoyas, 3-0, finished the voting with 1,157 points as the top seven teams remained intact from last week.

Georgetown beat Hawaii Loa 74-45 last Monday to end a season-opening trip to Hawaii and defeated Southern Connecticut 80-46 on Saturday.

DePaul, 2-0, which blasted UCLA 80-61 on national television Saturday, received two first-place votes and 1,049 points. St. John's, 2-0, remained third with 932 points, ahead of Duke, 3-0, which received the other first-place vote.

Memphis State rounded out the top five with 853 points, one more than No. 6 Louisville, 2-0, which lost the services of starting guard Milt Wagner for six weeks when he suffered a broken right foot in their 67-55 victory over Virginia Commonwealth. Illinois,5-1, remained seventh after their 73-70 victory over Oklahoma.

Track teams third at UConn

By CHRIS TREMBLAY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's and women's indoor track teams took third place in the University of Connecticut invitationals on Sunday.

For the men, John Panniccione won the 3,000 with a 8:30.01, Mark Themea took the 1,000 in 2:29.04 and Paul Stanislawzyk set a school record in the 1,500 with a 3:52.08, good enough for second.

For the women, Leah Lotus won the 600 with a 1:27.4 and the 4 x 200 relay team of Loftis, Kayla Morrison, Bridgette Booker and Cari Fleischmann set a school record and won the race with a 1:35.00.

UConn won both the men's and women's meets with 75 and 79.5 points respectively. St. John's took second in both meets.

In other times, Rawle Criehow was second in the 60 yeard dash and the all-freshamen relay team of Steve Tolly, Craig Moburg, Bill Stewart and Dan Lunardini did a 8:00.1.

Booker, Morrison, Barbara Cullianne and Susan Goldstein had seconds for the women.

UStore might eat Coffee Shop

By GREG BROWN
Collegian Staff

The Campus Center Administration will receive a proposal next week to replace the Campus Center Coffee Shop with an annex to the University Store.

The proposal will be made by the Study Commission to Review the Implications of an Increased Drinking Age, a committee formed to examine other avenues of profit for the Campus Center in light of decreased revenue for the Bluewall, Hatch, and Top of the Campus bars.

The Campus Center made $597,000 in beverage sales last year, according to the minutes of a commission meeting two weeks ago. At that meeting, Campus Center administrators said they expect to lose 50 percent of that, or about $300,000.

Expansion of the University Store's clothing department into the Coffee Shop would increase yearly revenue by at least that amount, according to a proposal from store managers.

Ira Rappaport, the Board of Governors' student representative, was the only commission member who dissented on the decision to make such a proposal.

He said the committee voted 4-1 to send the University Store proposal to Campus Center Director Bill Harris and Auxiliary Services Director Ashoke Ganguli.

The manager of the University Store, Winifred Cummings, was not available for comment.

In March 1983, the University Store made a similar proposal to the Campus Center Administration, but it was met with overwhelming student opposition.

BOG Treasurer Fran Hegeler said, "Two years ago, they weren't nearly as serious." She said the University Store's merchandising manager, John Kuusisto, presented "a very professional, organized proposal." The proposal was 14 pages long and had diagrams.

"It's only in the proposal stages, but it's a serious proposal," Hegeler said.

Hegeler said she felt the BOG had "several courses of action, but we really haven't decided which one to take yet." She said the board members will circulate surveys in the Campus Center today, as they did the last time the University Store revealed such plans, "and see what the students say."

"If you have 25,000 students that are angry about it, they (the administration) won't do it," she said.

U.S.A.F. considers radio network here

By TOM MIDDLETON
Collegian Staff

By building a network of underground radio transmitters, the Air Force hopes to ensure radio communications after a nuclear attack.

The United States Air Force is considering Amherst and surrounding areas as the possible site for an underground radio transmitter which would transmit signals through the ground to other locations in the event of a nuclear attack.

The station will be one in a $122 million network that will cover the northeastern U.S.. The project, expected to be completed within a year, is the first phase of a larger network which will cover the nation.

"The idea of the newwork is to build enough of them so it would not be in the enemy's best interest to knock each one of them out," said John O'Brien, civilian spokesman for the Electronic Systems Division at Hanscom Air Force Base in Bedford.

Radio transmissions must be bounced off the earth's atmosphere and in a nuclear attack the atmosphere would be disrupted, making normal radio transmissions impossible. By building a network of underground radio transmitters, the Air Force hopes to ensure communications after a nuclear attack.

The transmitter will have an underground antenna made of copper wires radiating out of it "like the spokes of a wheel," O'Brien said. "But as in all bureaucracies, there are others at higher levels who may review the project."

O'Brien said the Air Force will either lease or buy the land needed. "A lot depends on land availability," he said.

The Air Force is looking at areas within a nine-mile radius of Amherst. This area falls into the network pattern planned for the project O'Brien said

The Air Force constructed a pilot project linking underground transmitters from the Strategic Air Command in Nebraska and the North American Aerospace Command in Colorado.

The pilot was successful and the U.S. Congress appropriated $122 million for the first phase of the project, O'Brien said.

Grad senate: grievance policy 'overdue'

By SEAN CASEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Graduate Student Senate is currently circulating a petition urging UMass President David C. Knapp to sign and approve the proposed graduate student grievance procedure, which has lain dormant since 1977.

"This grievance procedure has been approved by all campus governing bodies, but it needs Knapp's signature, and we are requesting that the president act on it," Senate President Sanjiv Dugal said.

The senate, in a resolution passed at its last meeting, termed an official grievance procedure "long overdue and pressingly necessary" and urged Knapp to accept the procedure "without delay."

Dugal said Knapp had apparently found legal loopholes in the grievance procedure and refused to sign the procedure into policy until the loopholes were closed.

Senate Executive Officer Greg Graham, who has coordinated the senate's efforts to get the grievance procedure implemented, said that even with some obvious flaws, it should be signed immediately.

"The grievance procedure is very lengthy due to its complexity, but we should get it implemented, try it out for a while and then revise it," said Graham.

Last semester, a senate committee headed by Graham sent a letter to President Knapp asking him to sign the grievance procedure and listing several possible problems with the procedure which could be corrected once it was in practice.

Dugal said a lawyer from Knapp's office told him that

1,000 dead in India; factory officials arrested

BHOPAL, India (AP) - The poison gas leak from a pesticide plant has killed 1,000 people, doctors say, and many of the survivors in this central Indian city are threatened by blindness and sterility.

The doctors said many of the dead were children and the elderly, who were not strong enough to withstand or outrun the lethal cloud that spread over 25 square miles of this city of 900,000 on Monday.

The methyl isocyanate gas had begun leaking at 1 a.m. from an underground storage tank at a Union Carbide pesticide plant in a plant in a poor area of Bhopal. The leak was stopped after 40 minutes, but the gas seeped silently over the city through the early hours of the morning.

Police Monday arrested five plant officials on negligence charges and sealed off the factory. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, who toured the city Tuesday, said it would never reopen.

Bimla Devi, 37, who lost her husband and their only child, said the acrid gas sent thousands of people scattering in panic. She said most of those who fell, coughing and crying, were old people and children.

Volunteers helped cremate 228 Hindus on blazing outdoor pyres that flickered bright orange against the dark sky Tuesday night. Other volunteers helped dig graves to bury Moslems 11 at a time in common 15-foot-long graves.

Doctors said the gas makes the lungs produce so much fluid that victims drown sometimes days after the exposure.

Drs. Parveen Chaudhary and S.K. Srivastava of Hamedia Hospital told The Associated Press they counted 500 corpses at the city's major hospitals and had reports of at least 500 more dead at hospitals on Bhopal's outskirts. The United News of India news agency said there were not less than 1,200 dead.

Doctors said as many as 200,000 people were affected by the gas, and Chaudhury said 20,000 may suffer serious after-effects.

He said some may lose their eyesight, and some women may not be able to bear children.

The gas slowly dissipated into the atmosphere through the day, but air samples on Tuesday still showed traces of poison in the air.

Gandhi toured the area, visiting hospital wards and talking with orphaned children. He vowed to stop the production of dangerous chemicals in urban areas.

Officials at Union Carbide's U.S. headquaters suspended worldwide use of methylisocyanate, a liquid that turns to gas when it comes in contact with air.

S. Mitra, a plant official, said one underground storage tank containing 15 tons of methylisocyanate was still intact at the plant.

He said the gas escaped from another 15-ton tank that had not been tapped since October. So much pressure had built up within the tank that it had "over-passed" a safety filter, he said.

Ma. drinking age going up

BOSTON (AP)—Gov. Michael S. Dukakis signed a bill Tuesday that raises the drinking age in Massachusetts from 20 to 21, effective June 1, 1985 or earlier if all other New England states plus New York conform to that age.

Dukakis, who twice vetoed bills to raise the drinking age during his first term, quietly signed the measure without any of the fanfare that has accompanied other of his actions to combat the problem of drunken driving on Massachusetts roads.

Earlier Tuesday, Dukakis was asked why he decided to approve the age change after twice rejecting it in the past. He quickly said "because we have to if we'll qualify for federal funds" and declined further comment.

The Massachusetts action comes after Congress approved a law that will deprive states of 5 percent of their federal highway funds in 1986-87 if they do not establish 21 as the drinking age by Oct. 1, 1986. States will lose an additional 10 percent of the funds the following year if they don't act.

The Bay State would lose an estimated $25.5 million over the two years, according to state transportation officials.

"One can't ignore that," said James Dorsey, press secretary to Dukakis. "...But people need to be aware that this is not a panacea. Much needs to be done in the area of education and at all age levels. The problem is not restricted to young people."

"The governor's concern all along has been that Massachusetts and the other northeastern states work diligently toward establishing a uniform drinking age. Whether it's 20 or 21 takes a back seat to the issue of uniformity," he said.

During legislative debate, many opponents said they didn't want Massachusetts to raise its drinking age and encourage the commonwealth's large college-age population to drive to neighboring states, get drunk and try to drive home.

But supporters said the federal aid cutoff probably will prompt border states to also act.

Tutu blasts Reagan S. Africa policy

WASHINGTON (AP)—Black Anglican Bishop Desmond M. Tutu called President Reagan's South African policy "immoral, evil and totally un-Christian" yesterday and offered to meet with the president before flying to Europe to receive the Nobel Peace Prize.

Reagan's chief spokesman said no meeting was planned.

Tutu brought members of the House Foreign Affairs subcommittee on Africa to their feet, in a standing ovation highly unusual for a congressional hearing, after saying the administration's policy of quiet diplomacy toward the white minority-ruled nation "is giving democracy a bad name."

"We are talking about a moral issue," the bishop-designate of Johannesburg said, declaring that South Africa's apartheid policy of racial segregation "is evil, is immoral, is un-Christion, without remainder."

"In my view, the Reagan administration's support and collaboration with it is equally immoral, evil and totally un-Christian," Tutu said.

"You are either for or against apartheid, and not by rhetoric," he added. "You are either in favor of evil, or you are in favor of good. You are either on the side of the oppressed or on the side of the oppressor. You can't be neutral."

Nineteen people, including seven House members, have been arrested during a 2-week-old series of demonstrations outside the South African embassy here.

Chilean government expels journalist

SANTIAGO, CHILE (AP)—The military government has expelled a Dutch freelance writer, the Dutch Embassy reports.

The writer, 25-year-old Gerrit Burgwal, was driven to Argentina on Monday. He had been arrested last Wednesday and accused of inciting disorder during a two-day national protest against military rule.

Burgwal, who had lived in Santiago since October, was arrested along with two Roman Catholic priests, a deacon and a seminary student.

The priests and the deacon were released, and the seminary student was sent into internal exile.

Universities sue asbestos producers for $6m

CONCORD, N.H.— A $6 million suit against 23 asbestos products makers has been filed by the University System of New Hampshire.

The suit, filed last month in U.S. District Court, claims the corporations sold asbestos products to the system when its buildings were being erected and that the companies "knew or should have known about the dangers of their asbestos products" but failed to disclose the associated health risks. Asbestos has been found to cause cancer.

The suit says asbestos materials in the system include accoustical and fireproofing materials, insulation and ceiling and floor tiles.

The state university system's asbestos testing program, begun three years ago, continues. Asbestos has been found at the Durham campus and Plymouth and Keene state colleges, but not at the Manchester campus nor new administrative offices in Lee.

Army sues for woman's ouster

BOSTON—An attorney for the Army said Tuesday that a declared lesbian was wrongfully reinstated in the University of Maine's ROTC program, arguing that the woman has since acknowledged she has engaged in homosexual acts "numerous times." The Army went to court seeking reversal of a decision that allowed Diane L. Matthews, a sergeant in the Army reserves, to remain in the military.

Pre-Columbian ceramic art exhibit brings 'distinction'

By LESLEY CLARK
Collegian Staff

The "Art of the Andes" exhibit at the University of Massachusetts tower library marks the first time an exhibit of "such a great magnitude" has been on display at UMass, Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey said last week at a reception honoring the collection.

The exhibit, titled "Art of the Andes: Pre-Columbian Sculptured and Painted Ceramics," is touring worldwide for the first time. UMass is fourth on an itinerary which includes the University of Edinburgh in Scotland, Duke University Museum of Art, and Tokyo, Japan.

"As one of the few sites in the United States to display the collection, it brings distinction to the University," said Deirdre A. Ling, vice-chancellor for University relations and development.

Provost Richard O'Brien said he hoped the exhibit "will typify the contribution the University can make to the community," and added, "It is a privilege to provide the campus with this type of an exhibit."

The exhibit, consisting of 190 pieces, is on loan from the Arthur M. Sackler collection. It was made available to the University through Donald Proulx, a professor of anthropology at UMass. Proulx, a specialist in Peruvian archeology, wrote two essays for the Sackler foundation exhibit catalogue and was able to arrange for the exhibit's loan to UMass.

Proulx, chairman of the Latin American Studies Program, said "It is an honor to have such a prestigious event available for the campus."

The exhibit represents the development of pottery in Pre-Columbian America during the 5,000 years before the arrival of the Spanish conquerers and the fall of the Incas. The oldest piece in the collection dates back to 1,000 B.C.

Proulx said all the vessels in the collection were funerary offerings that had been looted from tombs by Peruvian grave robbers and smuggled out of the country.

The Arthur M. Sackler Foundation provided financing for the exhibition, including a security staff of graduate anthropology students.

The exhibition, located on the fourth floor of the tower library, is open Mondays, Wednesdays, Fridays and Saturdays from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., Tuesdays and Thursdays noon to 7 p.m., and Sundays noon to 5 p.m.

Report reveals applicant profiles

The University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees will meet today to consider a report that updates the profiles of UMass applicants.

The report, prepared by the Trustee committee on admissions and financial aid, shows that the average wealth and standardized test scores for UMass applicants have risen in recent years. The trustees are not scheduled to vote on whether to accept the results of the report.

The trustees will also consider charging patients for the cost of operating the sensory motor control clinic on the Amherst campus. The clinic, which combines the use of robotics with traditional physical therapy, has helped pioneer work in helping persons regain the use of paralyzed limbs. The trustees are not scheduled to vote on this matter.

The trustees will meet at 2 p.m. in the Chancellor's Conference Room on the third floor of Whitmore Administration Building.

Petition demands Myers

Asking for return of Blue Wall entertainer

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Staff

Several University of Massachusetts students have begun a petition drive demanding that Blue Wall entertainer Cliff Myers be rehired, three weeks after he was released from his contract.

Last Friday, these students distributed individual petitions near the Blue Wall for students to sent through the campus mailing system to Campus Center Director William M. Harris.

Harris, who confirmed that the University "decided to exercise the cancellation clause" in their contract with Myers, said then that it would be inappropriate to tolerate Myers' behavior.

"This university has a history of being sensitive to the feelings of other cultures, all cultures," he said, and "his behavior is against the professional standpoint of the Campus Center."

Part of the petition reads, "The entertainer selected should not be the one who offends least but the one who the patrons want most. Since they want Cliff Myers, I demand he be rehired."

Blue Wall supervisor Tom Jacobs said Friday that business was "unusually light. Usually, we have three (bartending) stations open, but we only have one today".

Jacobs said this was a "guaranteed "result of Myers' absence. "That's what people came here for, Cliff, and now they go down the street (to Justin Ryan's, where Myers now performs on Fridays)."

Sophomore Bill Collins, who distributed petitions Friday, said he thought Myers had been unfairly treated.

"It seemed that a small number of people imposed their values and what they see as offensive, on the University population," Collens said yesterday. "These are the same people who have attepted to ban magazines, violent movies, and the homecoming queen.

"I don't condone what Myers' says, but I don't think we should ban him, Collins said.

Sophomore David Connell, a Blue Wall patron, said, "You'll always find someone who finds something offensive, (but) I think he (Myers could have changed his act to conform to University policy."

Another Blue Wall patron, junior Lance Foley, said the petition "doesn't address the fact that Cliff's problem is he's an entertainer, and it seems apparent that Cliff has to rely on personal (references). I don't think that he should have to rely on that kind of humor."

Campus Center Beverage Manager William Elmore declined to comment yesterday as to whether any further action would be taken in light of the petition, or how many petitions had been received.

Computers, worth $10,000, stolen

Computer equipment valued at more than $10,000 was reported stolen from Worcester Dining Commons over the past weekend.

Jeanne Hopkins Stover, a University of Massachusetts spokeswoman, said the theft was reported Monday and there were signs of forced entry.

"The equipment was used for inventory, ordering, bookkeeping, and word processing," she said, "(but) this won't jeopardize food operations."

Three main units and some smaller peices of Digital computer equipment were stolen, she said.

UMass Chief of Police Robert G. Joyce said there were no suspects in the theft.

Negotiations urged to revise campus swing space policy

By BOB BURGESS
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate will vote tonight on whether to approve "immediate negotiations" with University of Massachusetts officials to revise the on-campus swing space policy.

Swing space is emergency housing for students left without a dormitory room at the beginning of a semester. These students are temporarily housed in the Campus Center Hotel and in extra dormitory space like lounges, music rooms, study rooms.

According to Brown House Senator Stacy Roth, who sponsored the motion, the current policy has reduced the number of study areas in dorms campus-wide so greatly that a system change is essential, especially during final exam periods.

Roth said yesterday that she was initially approached by Brown House Council members and other dormitory residents who complained of a lack of study space, and that she then went to other area councils with the issue and found similar problems.

"A major problem in Sylvan," Roth said, "is that one suite in each dorm which is designed as a study area has been used as a swing space. After 4-6 weeks, this area is supposed to be turned back into a study area, but often it remains a swing space for the remainder of the semester."

Roth said other residential area study rooms and common rooms have been used as swing space across campus and that all but one residential area council have approved her redesign resolution.

"Naturally, the amount of dorm study space is important," Housing Service Director Gerald A. Quarles said, "but for me it's more important to get students off the streets at the beginning of the semester and into a dorm."

Begun in 1977, the swing space policy has not been revised, although about 300 students entering the university in 1982 were temporarily housed in the Campus Center Hotel.

Quarles said he sees "no relief" to emergency housing problems and the lack of dorm study space for the next few years.

UMass Craft Fair displays local art

Local craftspeople will showcase and sell their crafts at tables on the Campus Center Concourse this week, as part of a fundraiser for the Craft Shop.

Instead of the vendors who usually set up tables at the concourse, 22 tables will feature jewelry, leather goods, ceramics and other crafts, today through Friday.

The Craft Fair is jointly sponsored by the Craft Shop and the Governor's Program Council (GPC). The money made from renting tables will go to the Craft Shop, GPC coordinator Julie Slavitt said.

Student craftspeople paid $15 per table to sell their goods, while non-students paid $30

Slavitt said the fair will include entertainment by the Chamber Choir and the Music Theater Guild, and Earthfoods will sell food.

"The fair is being held to make money and publicize the Craft Shop," Slavitt said.

"They're doing much better than they have in the past, but they could still use new materials," she said.

The Craft Shop provides free training and facilities for students who wish to learn about leatherwork, sculpting and other crafts.

Students have to pay only for the materials used.

Abusive words and painted obscenities reported

A disturbance was reported by an Amherst woman who was crossing Amity Street at the North Pleasant Street intersection Monday when a driver rolled down his car window and yelled abusive words at her, Amherst police said.

The driver apparently had slammed on his breaks to avoid hitting the woman, police said.

A Belchertown Road resident received an annoying phone call Monday night regarding "stories" the resident had written.

Police said the resident described the caller as a college-age man.

The Amherst Department of Public Works, reported Monday morning that obscenities were spray painted on one of its buildings, police said.

Slippery road conditions caused three accidents Monday, police said.

A wooden sliding door in the Hampden Dining Commons, valued at more than $100, was smashed this past weekend, University of Massachusetts police said. The door served as the entrance to the Kosher food kitchen, but nothing was reported stolen from the kitchen.

Amherst police issued 80 warnings Monday night to drivers who had their cars parked on town streets. Police began ticketing cars last night. Police said violators are being fined $3 and vehicles are subject to towing.

the main problem with the procedure was not in the structure of the procedure itself, but that the administration would probably not consider a policy unless it applied to both graduate and undergraduate students at UMass campuses in Amherst, Boston and Worcester.

"Personally, I don't think some administrators really want the procedure passed, but just give it lip service, and so through this position, we are going outside them (the administration)," Dugal said.

Dugal urged senators to solicit the signatures of both students and faculty members on the petition, which he said he hopes to have substantially endorsed by the end of this semester and may continue into next semester if no action is taken on the procedure.

Women faculty fight for equal tenure privileges

Of those with tenure, 89 percent are men

By DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

Editors note: this story is the third in a five-part series that examines the status of women faculty at UMass. Yesterday's story focused on the problems of particular departments in hiring women.

In 1980, Anne Mochon, a faculty member of the art history deparment, was up for tenure and was denied it. Her research on early 20th century German women artists was deemed by then-provost Loren Baritz as having failed to show sufficient strength.

In 1982, Joyce Berkman, a faculty member of the history department, was up for tenure. The decision was delayed at the provost level. When she went to inquire she was told her research on women and history was not good enough.

"My topic was not ranked as significant" Berkman said.

Mochon's case set precedent at UMass. It was the first time a candidate for tenure had been approved by the Department Personnel Committee, the Faculty Personnel Committee and the Dean, but was rejected at the provost level, Mochon said.

University is sued

Machon fought her case, first through the University's internal grievance procedure and, when this proved unsuccessful, with the help the faculty union, the Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP). The MSP recommended that the case be re-opened, and when the University refused, the union pursued the case in the civil court and eventually the University agreed to settle. In the Spring of 1984, Mochon was finally awarded tenure.

Asked if she believes she was discriminated against because of her sex and the particular focus of her research, Mochon replied, "No provost is ever going to intimate that this is so, (but) it was clear his standards."

Berkman argued her own case and was awarded tenure but, she said, "it was a form of sex discrimination."

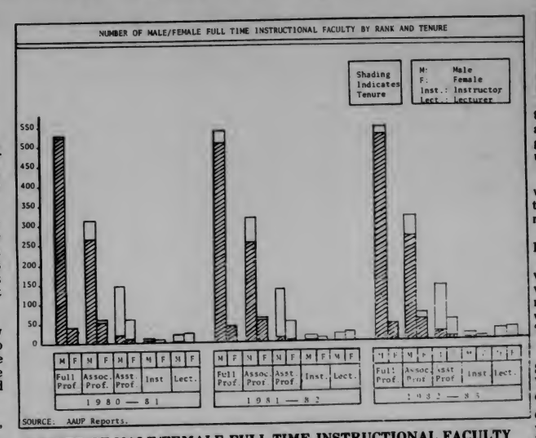
The experiences of Machon and Berkman help in understanding why women are so under-represented in the tenured ranks. Although figures from the Personnel Office for the Fall 1983 show that UMass has 896 tenured faculty members, only 104 of these positions are filled by women. Men make up 89 percent of all tenured faculty.

And it is tenure which gives faculty members security in their jobs and allows them full rights and priveleges of faculty.

Tenure clock ticks too fast

But outright denial of tenure is not only reason for the lack of tenured women faculty. According to most faculty members and administrators interviewed, another major reason is the discriminatory nature of the "tenure clock"; if at the end of six years, faculty members have not proved themselves worthy of tenure their employment is terminated.

Berkman called it a "male-designed clock" because it fails to account for the likelihood that "most women have to juggle extra responsabilities such as home, family and children." She suggested that these extra restraints on a woman's time may mean that when the tenure date dawns, her scholarly record may be less impressive than that of a man.



NUMBER OF MALE/FEMALE FULL TIME INSTRUCTIONAL FACULTY BY RANK AND TENURE

Chancellor Joseph Duffey agreed that "the six year rule does work against women." When I was at the American Association of University Professors I was one of those who tried to get that revised."

Asked whether he has continued his attempts at revision at UMass, he replied "No, I can't say I've spent a lot of time working on it. I haven't been asked to make any recommendations or comments."

According to Anthropology Professor Professor Sylvia Forman, another reason the tenure system places women at a disadvantage is because the decision is based largely on research and scholarly productivity and "women devote much more of their time to advising and teaching than research."

"Women take on an inordinate amount of advisees," Berkman said, "and this takes its toll on merit for published work."

"Machon said this example in some ways...points to the situation in my case. I was always teaching very large classes."

Berkman said, "The University needs to be more open-handed in giving merit for teaching and advising. Chancellor Duffey agreed that "at this campus, faculty do not give as much attention to counselling and undergraduate teaching as they should."

"I have made it clear in the past, and I will continue to make it clear that the faculty should wiegh counseling and teaching in making its decisions," Duffey said.

Exodus of women called "alarming."

Another explanation for lack of tenured women faculty is that "women are leaving voluntarily before they are tenured," Forman said. Berkman described the rate at which women faculty leave UMass as "alarming."

Berkman, together with the Faculty Senate Subcommittee on the Status of Women, is finalizing a questionaire designed to investigate the satisfaction and dissatisfaction of female faculty; why womena re leaving and why there has been little growth. This sort of information, together with statistics on retention, has not been provided by the University.

Berkman believes that many women are "wooed away by better salaries elsewhere." English Professor Arlyn Diamond contends that when women faculty are offered higher salaries by other Universities or Industries, the University is satisfied to simply let them go."

"In the two years I have been here" said Duffey, responding to the accusation, "I have only participated in four or five situations where the University tried to match an offer and one of these happened to be a woman," he said. But he also conceded that although "sex should not be a criteria" in making offers, "perhaps sometimes it is."

Duffey believes "tenured faculty are normally older faculty who have been around a little longer," and he said this accounts for why men are so substantially represented.

But although he claims "you have to begin with the historical factors and understand them," he does not discount another factor: "human cussedness and orneriness."

Tomorrow's story will focus on salaries.

Sigma Phi Epsilon makes repairs on vandalized house

By LORI KIRKLAND
Collegian Correspondent

Acts of serious vandalism and neglet from previous fraternity occupants left the Butterfield Terrace house in shambles. But, after the members of Sigma Phi Epsilon fixed it up, they were granted the permit they needed to occupy the house that was vacated last May.

"We had to install fire extinquishers, fix plumbing and electrical fixtures, and replace a lot of doors and windows. There were holes in the walls and garbage all over the place as a result of vandalism," said Chris Mason, president of Sigma Phi Epsilon.

"There was a lot of work involved in receiving a permit and making the house even liveable again," Mason said. The building previously housed the Kappa Sigma fraternity and was subject to much abuse during that time, he said.

According to Todd Thomas, assistant coordinator of Greek Affairs, Kappa Sigma fraternity was banned at the end of last semester by their national organization.

"The internal structure of the fraternity was weak. Their pride was minimal and the deterioration of the house was a symptom of these problems," Thomas said.

Sigma Phi Epsilon hired contractors to do the renovation work since funds were appropriated by Kappa Sigma's insurance company. "We were also granted a $500 loan, collected dues, and did some fundraising," Mason said. "Parties are always a good way to collect money, if it's done right," he said.

The fraternity had been off campus since it re-formed a year and a half ago. Sigma Phi Epsilon had an off-campus house until the early 1970's but financial difficulties forced members to sell the house to prevent losing the chapter, said Mason.

Although fraternity members see some possible problems neighboring Gorman dormitory, they don't expect any negative effects of their new move. "I don't think that the people in Gorman realize that this is not Kappa Sig; we are not the same nor do we have any intentions of bothering Gorman," Mason said.

"We don't want to be as many people perceive frat members:stuck up and in search of some identity. It's really a pretty mellow scene. Basically, we want a place to base our operation, a place where a bunch of friends can live together without being subjected to dorm rules and D.C. food," Mason said.

Panel: Ferraro violated ethics act

WASHINGTON(AP) - The House ethics committee found that Geraldine Ferraro violated the Ethics in Government Act at least 10 times but is not recommending any formal House action against the lame-duck representative, a congressional source said yesterday.

The committee voted 8-2 Monday to adopt a staff report that says the 1984 Democratic vice presidential nominee failed to provide complete information on her required financial disclosure statements since entering Congress in 1979, according to the source.

Investigators found no "decepted intent" by Ferraro and that the amended statements she filed on Oct. 1 after the ethics panel began its probe "include nearly all of the information originally omitted or misreported."

But because the New York lawmaker is leaving office when the 99th Congress convenes Jan. 3, the 12-member panel plans no further action, said the source, who spoke only on condition he not be identified.

Normally, when the ethics committee finds a House member in violation of the ethics law, it issues a statement of alleged violation, which the member has 21 calendar days to answer.

But the House loses ethics law jurisdiction over members when their terms end. With Congress now out of session, it would require a special meeting of the House to consider punishment that could range from reprimand to expulsion.

The committee report said Ms. Ferraro's six financial disclosure statements from 1979 through this year contained "numerous errors and omissions."

Doug, Doug, Doug, Doug, Doug

"What a bright and wonderful day," I exclaimed to myself as I woke up and threw back my Doug Flutie bedspread. I got out of bed and, half awake, practiced my Doug Flutie patented roll out until I wound up, face to face, with myself, in front of the mirror. I imagined how glorious it would be to be Doug Flutie. Then I remembered how perfectly white Doug Flutie's teeth always are so I grabbed my Doug Flutie toothbrush and headed for the bathroom.

After a refreshing shower I dried myself off with my Doug Flutie beach towel. I looked at my discarded Arnie Sportswear in my Doug Flutie waste basket and then prepared myself for the day. I put on my Doug Flutie socks, Doug Flutie pants, Doug Flutie coaching shoes, Doug Flutie tee shirt, Doug Flutie sweater, and Doug Flutie jacket. I grabbed my Doug Flutie notebook and Doug Flutie pen and pencil set, threw an imaginary T.D. pass to my framed, autographed photograph of Doug Flutie and left my room. As I left the room I proudly gazed at the 263 action shots of Doug Flutie that I had affixed to my door.

On my way to class I met my friend Mark who was smartly clothed in Doug Flutie Executive Sportswear. "Did you see the news this morning?" he asked me.

I replied in the negative. "They're rounding up the non-believers," he finished.

"Geez, it's hard to comprehend that some people just don't care about Doug Flutie," I replied in disbelief. "What's going to happen to them?"

"They're going to tie them down in a room with no windows and force them to watch Doug Flutie highlights set to 'Nobody Does it Better' until they change their ways," Mark told me.

"What if the heathens don't change?" I asked him.

"Then, God help the blasphemers," he emphatically replied.

"You said it!"

On that note we, our heads held high, went to class: History 220, The Early Years of Doug Flutie.

After class I had the kind of lunch that I thought Doug Flutie would have. After eating I went right home and played Doug Flutie fight songs on my guitar, which had a big number 22 scraped into it. I then took a nap for a couple of hours and dreamed about Doug Flutie.

I woke up with Doug Flutie on my mind and went down to dinner to eat the kind of dinner that I had read (in Doug Flutie magazine) Doug Flutie eats. After dinner I walked to the Doug Flutie study lounge to talk about Doug Flutie with a bunch of guys who care about Doug Flutie as much as I do.

Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, Doug Flutie, God.

Film opened eyes

Violence in films has become a very controversial issue and it is not something that should be treated lightly. My letter is in response to the complaints that were voiced over the movie Psycho which was shown November 29. When my sorority choose this as a fundraiser we were not aware of the way it depicted women. Psycho is a popular film that is shown on this campus every semester. We did not show this movie with the intentions of promoting violence against women, but rather of promoting an Alfred Hitchcock classic. Due to the fact that the Everywoman's Center made us more aware of the violence against women portrayed in both movies and their advertisements, we have relaized the severity of this situation and hope that this campus as a whole will begin to realize it also.

A lack of concern

Monday was the opening day for the Western Mass. Latin America Solidarity Committee's material aid drive for Nicaragua. We received many contributions, for which we are very grateful. However, while sorting through the articles received at our table in the Student Union Lobby, we found one disquieting "donation." In a stapled paper bag was a pile of defecation, along with the following message:

"The United States has every right to defeat Communism in this hemisphere! You are liberal skum (sic)! My gift is an extention (sic)! of the government of Nicaragua. It also represents what you are.

Is this what this person has to offer to millions of impovrished Nicaraguans? The question here is not political opinions or prejudices, but a basic compassion for humanity, a concern for people who made this offering might think of the Nicaraguan government — or of W.M.L.A.S.C., for that matter — it is both shocking and disheartening that this is how one responds to people engaged in a desperate struggle for their daily existence.

A disgusting gift and an unsigned note are clear indicators of this person's inability to rise above the limitations of his or her particular political viewpoint and deal with humanity in a compassionate way. The issue here is people, not politics, and we feel it is imperative to keep sight of our moral obligation to the rest of the people on this planet.

Finally, to the person who donated her or himself in such a personal way, we wonder what Freud would say.

Yale: a battleground

We wish to take issue with and clarify last Wednesday's Collegian coverage of the Yale strike lecture offered by Professor Richard Wolff.

After Wolff painstakingly stressed that comparable worth, in his opinion, was not the main issue in the strike, the reporter wrote the opposite. Professor Wolff preferred to focus on the issue of control, of input into the decision-making process at Yale. In this context Wolff said:

"What ever the strike is about, money is not it."

This brings us to a clarification absent in the article. Comparable worth is a social issue. It is not an issue restricted in any sense to the Yale strike. Comparable worth, is not the only issue of the strike. Rather, the particular issue would seem to be of control. From this flows the demand for more money. This demand is being made by a union comprised primarily of women, many of whom are single parents, trying to raise a family on $9,000 to $13,000 per year.

Though comparable worth and demands for increased income often exist side by side, they do not always exist this way. At this particular time in the push and pull, give and take situation of unionism at Yale, both aspects exist. Yale provides a battleground for the issue of comparable worth. It is not, however, the sole explanation of what is happening at Yale. The Collegian should look at the strike in a more serious manner.

'Our mainstream media,' when reporting on the strike (if at all), provide a sensationalist focus on comparable worth. We see no reaon why the Collegian should reproduce such a position, especially with regard to Professor Wolff, who offered a different interpretation.

Stop it

This fall Peter Dow has written several articles on Central America. He has consistently mistated the truth. I believe that everyone has the right to mislead people by stating as a fact something that is not true. I think that Peter has abused his position as a Collegian columnist. I don't believe that he should be allowed to continue to use the opinion page to misinform the public.

US policies that lead to disaster

Rob Ginocchio

It is morbidly ironic that the United States which prides itself on being the predominate "leader of freedom and democracy" in the Western hemisphere substaintially supports authoritarian governments. These regimes are the world's most habitual violators of human rights; terrorism is frequently used as a device to stamp out oppositions and stifle individual freedoms while basic human needs such as health and medical facilities are carelessly neglected.

The policies of the Reagan administration and ones before it have supported such governments for three reasons. Firstly, distribution of economic and military aid allows the United States to sustain strategic leverage over its adversaries — primarily Cuba and the Soviet Union. Secondly, the leaders of such countries are fast to extinguish political flare-ups, thus creating regional stability. Lastly, but most importantly, authoritarians support the free market system and the presence of U.S. multinational corporations in their countries while maintaining a bitter hatred towards communism.

A policy which overtly supports oppressive regimes might prove effective in the short run but will inevitably lead to disaster in the not-too-distant future.

Within the past decade or so, the United States has witnessed the outburst of several uprisings in Central America which advocate the need for social and political change. These rebellions are becoming increasingly burdensome to the U.S. in that they are becoming more and more difficult to contain. The rebels in El Salvador have held ground for the past five years, the Guatemalan dictatorship is facing political upheaval, and of course the legacy of Nicaragua is well known.

The Reagan administration entertains a policy which seeks to eliminate all traces of leftist forces which "contaminate" the Southern hemispheres while promoting democratic idealism. The truth of the matter is that a U.S. - based democratization of these countries is highly unlikely. First, rebel instigators and successful leftist juntas embrace Marxian-and socialist-type governments because they associate democratic capitalism with corrupt dictatorships and U.S. imperialism. In the second place, one must realize that a capitalist democracy is not feasible without the emergence of a substantial middle class which none of these countries (with a few exceptions) have. Thirdly, conservatives such as Jeane Kirkpatrick who claim that authoritarian governments will "come around to democracy sooner or later" should re-evaluate themselves when analyzing the countries of the Southern hemisphere; Paraguay has made no progress towards democracy, Pinochet plans to stay in power for at least another five years, and the Guatemalan dictatorship has no intentions of relinquishing power.

Conservatives are also quick in denouncing Marxist countries in the region as satellites of the Soviet Union and serve a potential threat to the United States. However, Cuba and Nicaragua turned to the Soviets only after the U.S. expressed hostility towards them.

It is quite evident that the Reagan administration gives no signs in changing its policies towards Central and South America. As a result, ultra-rightist countries remain highly oppressive towards their own people, thus generating a substantial amount of hatred towards the U.S.. The continuation of such policies will undoubtedly drive these people away from the U.S. policies will undoubtedly drive these people away from the U.S. and into the arms of the Soviets for at least moral support. As John Steinbeck once said, "Oppression only works to strengthen the oppressed."

In search of a glimmer of hope

Deborah Neubauer

In recent weeks, I've been reading the papers daily searching for a glimmer of human hope, just one sign that human being are not irretrievably set upon the path of their destruction. Much to my despair, no news would have been good news, but in this case, there was far too much news. The paper this Sunday told me of the government twisting the law to it's full extent in the cases of Vietnam Veterans trying to press charges for their sufferings due to atomic testing. The government has made themselves the sole party which could be sued by these veterans, yet when these soldiers entered into their combat gear, they swore they would never press charges against the United States government. But all in the same breath, we find President Reagan commemmorating the dead soldiers, with a war memorial which has some 55,000 names on it. In addition, he gave a speech acknowledging their inordinate sacrifice, many gave their lives for their country. "These men belong to us," he vociferated. There's a strange and ironic twist to the words he spoke. In fact, these men did belong to us, the United States government, and the corporate colonialist interests which demanded our entry into Vietnam. Today, we have a different war on our front, equally nonsensical, and equally threatening to "tear the fabric of our own country apart" in the President's own words. And once again, these men belong to us. But who is this "us" he speaks of? If the President really respected human life and sacrifice, why, may I ask, is he commanding an illegal border war in Honduras, funding the Contra opposition to the Sandinista government down in Nicaragua which is waging a not-so-covert war against the peasantry of Nicaragua, and sabotaging the Sandinista government. How could he possibly respect human life and dignity, when he commands so many to die?

But read on. I did, and the human condition became ever more distressing. I read of "intelligent and pleasant" killers who "kill for the fun of it," and are not crazy, psychotic, or neurotic, according to leading technicians. Then I read of the effect air-borne pollutants are having over in Euorope are just dying from the pollutants which seep into the top soil and destroy the ability of trees to absorb necessary nutrients.

But, I think the epitome came when I read that a doctor was being funded by the United States government to do testing on people who have nuclear war "phobia." As though it were irrational to be afraid of the destructive capabilities of nuclear power.

I read of unpleasant situation after situation. The alarming fact, however, jumped off the paper and right into my lap. All these disasters are simply MAN-MADE creations. We have created, or rather should I say, Corporate America, and even Corporate Europe, have created our own destruction. These men who compromise about four percent of the population, who run the bureaucracy of government, and the structure of corporate enterprise, have not only created products with deadly by-products, causing the destruction of our environment, but have even jumped into the position of "God", and are now commanding who shall live and who shall die. They have set whole nations of people against each other so they could market their products.

Now, I want to know why? Why have we given these men the authority to dictate to us the structure of our lives? This technology that humans have created, cannot buy us fresh air, cannot buy us clean rivers. Their medicine cannot find anything clinically wrong with men who kill, over and over, "for the fun of it." Their laws condemn the helpless pawns of fate, pawns who serve their country with glory, who are at the mercy of multi-national corporate demands in conspiracy with the government. All I want to know is, who allowed them to decide our fate and how have we allowed them to all but destroy our world?

Learn to learn

Once again the pass/fail option has been the topic of heated debate in the faculty senate. On November 29, the Faculty Senate passed an amendment to the General Education proposal stating that no General Education classes will be allowed to be taken pass/fail. While there is very little that can be done now to change this amendment, hopefully some of the faculty will take the following options into consideration when the Faculty Senate chooses to do away with pass/fail altogether.

The pass/fail option is a good one for various reasons. The most common argument from both students and faculty is that it allows students to challenge themselves in courses which are more demanding and venturesome than those they would normally take. Without this option, students may tend to "play it safe" with classes they had in high school. Secondly, the pass/fail option allows students to concentrate more on the substance of a course than the grade that will ultimately be received. A third argument is the desperate need of students to have a diversified liberal arts education. With the vocational, high-technology path our University is unfortunately taking, students must be encouraged to learn about history, literature, and science. It has been shown that about 60 percent of the pass/fail enrollments are in the College of Arts and Sciences.

I do admit that there are students who take pass/fail classes for reasons other than those stated above. I dare say, however, that there are a number of classes (commonly called "gut" classes) which a student can pass with very little effort and attendence. It may be more worthwhile then, for the Faculty Senate to review the academic quality of these classes, instead of abolishing the pass/fail option.

SGA Academic Affairs Committee

A reversal or generic use of the acronyms, especially at this time of the semster, may result in longer lines. The other divine Sarah

Sarah Vaughan
At the Fine Arts Center
Saturday, December

Sarah Vaughan, who has been credited with "the most remarkable voice that any of our popular singers has ever possessed", graced the Fine Arts Center Saturday night with a tremendous display of her considerable vocal talents.

She made her debut in 1940 at age 16, launching her singing career with Earl "Fatha" Hines and Billy Eckstine. She has since appeared with practically everybody and toured practically everywhere, much to everyone's delight.

Appearing in a dress as colorful as her singing, Vaughn opened the show with "Fascinating Rhythm", which demonstrated that, at once deep and throaty then high and flighty, her versatile voice has not suffered over the years.

Her accompanists were similarly talented. George Gaffney on piano was elegant and precise (even Vaughan exclaimed, "Isn't he good?, while Howard Jones on drums was subtle and supportive. Andrew Simpkins on bass demonstrated his virtuosity in an amazing solo in "East O' the Sun"

Although Vaughan occasionally lost track of the words, she would always sustain the melody with humorous improvised lyrics. This is not unprecedented. Ella Fitzgerald's record Mack the Knife(on the recently ressurected Verve label) is famed for her fudged lyrics on the title track. And who can forget Sinatra's alternate ending for the Weil classic?

Vaughan gave a scat vocal rendition of "Sweet Georgia Brown" because she "forgot the words". No offense to the song's composers Bernie, Pinkard and Casey, but may she never remember them!

While she tried to end the concert with a spirited version of Cole Porter's "From This Moment On", the audience's standing ovation demanded an encore. After taking and rejecting requests for a final song, she settled on the poignant "Send in the Clowns".

Clowns were needed to cheer up the void the audience was faced with once Ms. Vaughan ended the show. She left the stage like the setting sun.

OLDIES BUT GOODIES — Sarah Vaughn charmed the Fine Arts Center audience with her singing on Saturday night.

Short Eyes explores prison tension

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

Short Eyes
By Miguel Pinero
Hampden Theater

Drama and reality are so intertwined that at times it is hard to separate them. Miguel Pinero's play Short eyes, dramatizing prison life, was one of these moments, as performed last week at Hampden Theater in Southwest Residential area at the University of Massachusetts.

In addititon to outlining the harsh realities of prison life, the play also presented the paradox of a relationship between a Puerto Rican girl, played by Cintia Merced-Rivera and her molester, Clark Davis; and that of Clark and a fellow prisoner.

The role of Clark was mastered perfectly both in establishing the relationship with the child and in dealing with the other prisoners' harassment.

The audience could not only walk in his shoes, but also feel his emotions and inner fears, which he demonstrated very well in his pacing, nervousness and perspiration.

The other actors also performed their parts in a genuine fashion and should be praised for their talent and ability and for adding juice to the meat of the play with their unique performance.

However the character which was the most real was that of Juan.

The play showed the prejudice which child molesters confront from other prisoners. But there was always an exception in Juan, making this character not only human, but also very real. This was the part of Edwin Cancel, a University of Massachusetts education major playing Juan.

Clark, a victim of circumstancial evidence, found in Juan a friend, Juan was the only prisoner who was friendly to him. Therefore, Clark felt compelled to tell him about his crimes of passion.

Looking for sympathy and understanding, Clark reveals his past wrongdoing. Despite his enragement at hearing the stories, Juan listens and contemplates and remains faithful until Clark meets his tragic end.

The drama was intense, keeping the audience aroused to the issues, some humorous, some harsh, some sad, but always for real. For instance, where else would one see a kaleidoscopic group of men discussing religion, good and evil, sex, masturbation and being Black and Puerto Rican in the American society?

Where else but a day room of a house of detention in the present time.

Directed by Peter Hyams
Starring Roy Scheider and John Lithgow
Starting Friday at Hampshire Mall Cinema

Remember a profound science fiction movie with an ending no one really understood? (Those who said they did were just being deep.) Remember a neurotic computer called H.A.L. who had a weak spot for chess? Well, all your favorite characters from Arthur C. Clarke's 2001: A Space Odyssey are back just in time for christmas.

The year is 2010, and a team of American and Russian scientists are aboard the Russian spacecraft Leonov. A decade has gone by since the American discovery came across the mystical black monolith orbits among the moons of Jupiter, and Leonov's mission is to investigate the troublesome black monolith. Thanks to clarke's collaboration on the screenplay and the optimistic direction of Peter Hyams (Outland, Capricorn one), what happens on this journey is not your average Battlestar Galactica material

Roy Scheider and John Lithgow's versatility and Scheider's strength as an actor give enough humanity to match Richard Edlund's state-of-the-art visual effects.

Bob Balaban, Roy Scheider, and John Lithgow star in 2010

With Lithgow in the movie, it is almost impossible not to expect him to shine a little comedy, and he fulfills this expectation perfectly. The ensemble Russian cast are equally satisfying with their dynamic performances. Bob Balaban is also suitably cast as H.A.L.'s creator and has a few touching scenes with his protege.

Peter Hyam's direction might dissappoint those who expect another Kubrikaian statement about the evolution of man (monkeys throwing sticks in the air and everything). However, one has to accept that 2010 does not claim to be 2001. In times like this, Hyam's message is an outcry for global harmony and cooperation, and perhaps that is what we need most.

The visual effects of 2010 must be some of the most breath-taking film images I can remember form the last couple of years. Edlund's slick sets and crisp photography will put a smile of satisfaction on the prophetic face of author Clarke Experience scientific discovery at the West Indies Laboratory.

Discover the coral reefs of the U.S. Virgin Islands at FDU's West Indies Lab. At our Caribbean field station on the island of St. Croix, you'll combine academics with adventure during a semester, summer session or January session in a diverse tropical environment.

Full-time, resident faculty teach courses in • marine ecology, • biology, • geology and • environmental studies, surrounded by one of the world's most fragile and fascinating ecosystems. The laboratory owns a fleet of land and marine vehicles, and you can explore the multicolored reefs with a full stock of snorkel and scuba gear.

Students from your institution have earned credit through this innovative, fully accredited program since its inception in 1971.

Spring Break for the Upperclasses.

Other vacation spots may be okay for those Freshmen and Sophomoric types that don't know any better, but by the time you've made it to the higher classes, we hope you've learned something.

By now, you should know that Bermuda College Weeks are as much fun and as carefree, but with a difference. There's a little more atmosphere here. There are free buffet lunches at our top hotels, our smashing beach parties, our steel bands and calypso bands, our complimentary cruises and, of course, our gorgeous pink beaches and beautiful weather.

So this year make use of your education—come to Bermuda, where you can carouse with class, get wild in style.

3 named all-NE

Bird, Stukes most valuable

By GERRY DESIMAS
Collegian Staff

It was easy to overlook the veteran upperclassmen on the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team with six freshman starters on the squad.

But it was the upperclassmen who provided the glue for the 15-3-2 and third in the nation Minutement. Senior co-captain Lori Stukes, a sweeper back, and junior Sue Bird, a former wing turned defender, were named by their teammates as most valuable players.

In the All-New England picks, the freshmen made their mark. UMass' leading scorer Jolie DePauw (14 goals, six assists, 34 points) and striker Kristen Bowsher (6-3-15 points) were named to the 11 member first team. Stukes was also named to the first team.

Senior Chris Taggart, an All-American pick last year with Stukes, made the second team.

The Minutemen, defending New England Champions, were named champion for the second year in a row with the top ranking in the final poll.

Final New England Rankings: 1) UMass, 67 points. 2). UConn, 64. 3). Brown, 56. 4.) Harvard, 49. 5). Boston College, 41. 6). Vermont, 36.

"We're still working with the lineups to see what everybody feels comfortable with," Stevens said. "Everyone is feeling more comfortable with their roles." Matthews usually starts at the shooting guard slot and moves to small forward, the coach said. "That's where she seems to do most of her scoring," Stevens said.

And scoring is why Matthews is starting for the Minutemen.

"You only live once, so if you really have a love for something, if you really want something, you'll get it," Matthews said. "I want to help UMass go places they haven't been before. And have some fun while doing it."

Transfer shines

Matthews providing the spark for women's hoop

By GERRY DESIMAS
Collegian Staff

It has been a slow start for the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team. Three straight losses were endured before a 59-53 victory over Boston University last Saturday.

It has also been a slow start for first-year Minuteman Juanita Matthews, the 5-9 junior guard/forward, who scored over 1,000 points in two years at Middlesex Community College and averaged 24.3 points a game last season, scored just six points (against Boston College) and eight points (against Florida) in her first two games.

More than 14 points in two games was expected of the two-time All-New England junior college pick.

"We expected Juanita to make an immediate contribution," second year coach Barbara Stevens said.

"Last year, we needed someone to put the ball in the hoop besides Barbara Hebel (second team All-Atlantic 10, 16.1 ppg).

UMass guard Juanita Matthews has scored 31 points in her last two games. The junior has been a major addition to UM.

We wanted to take the pressure off of her," Stevens said.

"I was kind of nervous," Matthews said of her Division I debut against BC. Then she and the Minutemen faced a Top 20 caliber team in Florida and lost big again, 67-51.

"I really want to help the team as much as I can," Matthews said. "I want to back them up as much as I can and keep a positive attitude."

Matthews, a sports management major, finally began helping the team the best way she knows. By scoring. She hit for 12 in the loss to Providence and had a team-high 17 points against BU in UMass' first win of the year at the Warner Classic in Fairfield, Conn.

"I've never been so determined to win a game in my life," said Matthews, a teammate of Old Dominion All-America Medina Dixon at Cambridge Ridge and Latin high school. "I feel that if I can help the team realize that if they really want something bad enough, you can get it, if you concentrate."

"She's been a very big asset to the team," junior captain Jerrie Bernier said. "She can score at will, when she wants to and we need someone like that."

Matthews can shoot and she is quick, probably the fastest player on the team outside of guard JoAnn Dupuis. And Matthews, who shot some hoops with Patrick Ewing in high school, has excellent ball-handling skills.

"At 5-10 (it says 5-9 in the media guide), she gives us a big guard set (with 5-9 Hebel)," Stevens said. "She has that explosive first step to the hoop. She's a legitimate scorer." Matthews is averaging 10.8 points a game, trailing Hebel (11.8) for the UMass lead.

Matthews does have her weaknesses, Stevens said, and it is on defense. "She's working very hard on it. She's trying to play both ends of the floor," the second year coach said.

The trick, though, is to play as a team and Matthews realizes that. "We are playing as a team and not for our individual selves," she said about the BU effort. Matthews leads the team with eight assists.

UMass co-captain Ken Dougherty and the Minuteman gymnasts face the University of Lowell tonight at Boyden at 7 p.m.. UMass is undefeated.

Men's Gymnastics host ULowell tonight

Swimmers travel to Tufts, look for second win

By NANCY A. BUKAR
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's swimming and gymnastics teams get back into action today with both squads looking for their second victories of the dual meet season.

The gymnastics face Division II Lowell University at Boyden Gymnastic Center at 7 p.m. The Minutemen are coming off of a 255.40 to 255.85 win over Army.

"I think we should be able to defeat Lowell pretty easily," UMass coach Roy Johnson said. "He took them 241 to 197 last season and I think we're better this year.

Both Joe DeMarco and Roberto Weil will sit out the meet according to Johnson, but four others will compete against Lowell who didn't see action against Army.

Eric Ciccone, co-captain Tony Sbarra, Stan Gatland and Mark Quevillon are expected to score a lot of points for UMass. Co-captain Ken Dougherty (who has a 9.4 in the pommell horse) will be in the all-around.

Two freshmen, Rick Rourke and Jay Rohayne, will also play big roles in the meet, which is at 7 p.m.

The men's swim team heads down the Pike to Medford and a date with a Jumbos, a team coach Russ Yarworth said will give UMass, 1-0, "a lot" more trouble than Lowell, who UM beat 80-33 on Saturday at home.

On Saturday UM crunched the Chiefs as junior transfer Craig Fuller shattered the UM school record in the 200 yard butterfly with a time of 1:56:83.

The Minutemen took all but one swimming event. Paul McDonough won both the 100 freestyle (:50.64) and the 200 freestyle (1:49.65) for UMass.

"Tufts and Springfield (the next meet at Springfield next Wednesday) will tell a lot more about us than the Lowell meet did," Yarworth said.

"We aren't taking a few guys because of academic committments and that will hurt us," the coach said. "But I still think we can beat them."

"All that really matters when you come down to it is who wins the final event (the New Englands) and I think we're looking good there. But we would still like to win this one ." The meet begins at 4 p.m.

New coach, better talent keys for women gymnasts

Injuries plague UMass before opener

By ANN TAUGER
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's gymnastic team will open its season Friday with the annual UMass Invitational Meet at Boyden Gym.

"Though New Hampshire is strongly favored to repeat their victory (at the UM meet), I feel we are physically and mentally stronger and more prepared than the last couple of years," new UM coach Charles Schiebler said.

UMass, UNH, Connecticut and Northeastern will compete in the meet, a contest that Schiebler feels will indicate how well the UMass women handle pressure.

Among the Minutemen's strongest performers is co-captain Jennifer Pancost, a senior.

"Jennifer has a good attitude for training and a good mental attitude," the coach said. "She really pushes in her routines."

UMass may suffer from injuries this year however as junior Chris Cloutier will not compete Friday with a back injury. She should return by January.

Junior Yael Cantor will undergo knee surgery during the intersession and co-captain Abigail Farris is also hobbled by a knee injury. Cantor may return this season, Farris will not, but will still captain the team.

To compensate for these injuries, Schiebler is training each team member to be an all-around competitor.

In actual competition, gymnasts specialize in vaulting, uneven parallel bars, the balance beam, or floor exercises. Schiebler, who couldn't name a line-up because of the injuries, hopes that if each woman can do different events the team can make-up for the injuries.

The coach said he had two goals for the season, to make the NCAA regional competition and for "every woman to feel she became better at the end of the season compared to the beginning."

"I see a much better team already," said Pancost. "There is no reason we won't make the regionals (in Pittsburg). We have a new coach and more talent."

Minutemen eighth in N E

Respect doesn't come easily, especially in New England basketball circles.

The University of Massachusetts, 2-0, was ranked eighth in the United Press International poll of New England Division 1 schools released Monday.

The Minutemen are behind their opponents tomorrow night, the 0-1 University of Connecticut (third) and Providence College (sixth) at 2-2 despite a loss to Division II Assumption.

"A lot of people don't know what to expect of us," UM forward Bobby Braun said. "We're kind of different. There's no center and we're coming off of a losing season. But when you look at who we have, I think we have a pretty good team."

Boston College and Northeastern were first and second in the poll followed in order by UConn, Harvard, BU, Providence, Brown and Fairfield. The Minutemen will play both Northeastern and BU next week at the Springfield Civic Center.

If UMass hopes to move up in the poll with wins against the Huskies and the Boston teams, it must improve on its free throw shooting.

UMass is a brick-laying 62 percent from the line at 32-of-51. Braun is the worst offender at two-of-nine. Only Carl Smith (seven-of-nine) and Ron Young (four-of-four) have kept UM out of real depths.

From the floor UMass is shooting 45 percent with senior co-captain Donald Russell at 70 percent and Smith at 77 percent (eight-of-eleven).

In the rebounding department, senior co-captain Horace Neysmith is averaging 9.5 boards a game with Braun getting nine. The scoring averages show Russell leading at 13.5 points-per-game, Neysmith with 12.5, Smith with 11.5 and Braun contributing ten ppg. Young has been chipping in seven.

ATLANTIC 10 NEWS: Four A-10 teams are undefeated, UMass at 2-0, URI at 3-0, George Washington at 2-0 and Rutgers at 1-0. Temple's Granger Hall, with an average of 25.5 points and 10.5 rebounds, was player-of-the-week. Battle had 27 in Rutgers only game.

This smokestack is part of the apparatus at UMass that violates the Clean Air Act of 1970.

Filters inoperable until spring

By IAN POLUMBAUM
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has already overrun three deadlines for compliance with the Clean Air Act, but will not begin operating its heating plant filtration system, on which construction began in 1980, until next spring at the earliest.

In the meantime, a state Department of Enviromental Quality Engineering official said yesterday, the power plant continues to violate the act by spewing about 300 tons of coal dust into the atmosphere every year.

Since 1980, the University has overrun three DEQE deadlines for completion of the "bag-house", the new building adjoining the plant that contains about 17,000 filter bags intended to catch unburnt dust before it goes up the smokestack.

Physical Plant Operations Supervisor Peter Wozniak said that due to "operational engineering problems," the bag-house cannot yet be tested without running the risk of having to shut down the heating system or endangering the lives of employees.

Lisa Capone, a spokesperson for the Attorney General's office, which at the DEQE's request is handling the case, said the University has not been taken to court-as was contemplated two months ago-but that state attorney Ann Rogers is currently negotiating with UMass officials, "trying to get (them) to comply" with the 1970 act.

Capone said it would be "inappropriate at this point" for Rogers or Assistant Attorney General Stephen Leonard, who oversees air quality cases, to comment on the negotiations.

The DEQE official, Western Massachusetts Air Quality Chief David Howland, said he would be "disappointed" if the negotiations simply resulted in a new deadline being set.

"I want them in compliance as soon as possible," Howland said. "They've failed to meet the deadline on three separate occasions. At this point it's up to the Attorney General's office to determine what's equitable in light of the health hazards."

Wozniak said a "bypass damper" for emergency use is not yet operational. "If we test it and the bypass doesn't work, we'll literally blow fire right out of the boilers," he said.

"If it fails, we've tried to make the air cleaner but we'll have created an even more dangerous situation, possibly endangering the lives of our workers."

Wozniak added that the manufacturer of the bag-house control panel has not yet provided certified instructions and schematic diagrams.

"My frustration is that I just don't see the pressure there should be coming to bear," he said. "The real solution is to do more engineering research, put the nose to the grindstone to get the baghouse working."

Asked who he thought was dragging their feet on the project, Wozniak said, "I keep my comments to myself."

Eight weeks ago, the supervisor of construction on the bag-house, who declined to be identified, said the system would be ready in six weeks.

Wozniak said, "I've got to be optimistic and say it'll be done by the first of the year," but added that the bag-house cannot be tested until the spring because during the coldest months there is too much steam being produced.

Many students will wear blue jeans tomorrow and those who do will be supporting gays and lesbians, according to an ad in the Collegian for Gay and Lesbian Day, which is also being called Gay and Lesbian Blue Jean Day.

The UMass community will celebrate Gay and Lesbian Day tomorrow with tables in front of the Hatch and events designed to educate the public and to stress the lighter side of homosexuality.

"According to the Kinsey report, 10 percent of any population is gay," said Bob Brigham, vice president of the People's Gay Alliance at UMass.

"Sometimes thinking about oppression can get to be a downer. This event is just going to be fun," Brigham said.

The Gay and Lesbian Social, regularly scheduled for Wednesdays, has been moved to Friday this week and a PGA dance will be held at 9 p.m. on the 10th floor of the Campus Center, to add to the festivities.

Free balloons will be given out and a "hug a homosexual" booth will be set up near the Hatch where women and men can hug a member of their own sex. Homosexuals and supporters of homosexuality are encouraged to wear blue jeans to show their support.

Hand-outs will be available at the tables to explain homosexual issues and to define terms because "a lot of people don't know the vocabulary."

On the UMass campus, Brigham said, the two biggest issues affecting homosexuals are "traditional harassment" and a move to have the administration establish an office of Gay and Lesbian Affairs similar to the offices for Third World and handicapped students.

Dorm votes on Secret Santa name

By DAN MILLER
Collegian Correspondent

Because of students' objections to the name "Secret Santa," Butterfield dormitory residents will vote tonight whether to change the name of the game.

The Butterfield House Counceil had decided Tuesday night to let students vote on the issue last night, but the ballots were not ready, so the vote will take place tonight in the Butterfield dining room.

Last Thursday, two Butterfield residents, Lisa Bernard and Andrea Griswold, objected to the use of the name Secret Santa. They said its use excludes dorm members who were not raised in the Christian tradition.

Trustees fund game buses

Also approve pay raise

BOSTON - University of Massachusetts students looking to attend "home" basketball games this season at the Springfield Civic Center won't have to pay for transportation to get there anymore, following a vote by the board of trustees yesterday to fund buses.

At the request of student trustee Jim Keller, the trustees agreed to appropriate the $1,000 necessary to fund the buses, which now cost students $3 for each round trip.

The buses leave Boyden Gymnasium beginning an hour and a half before game time (7:30 p.m. weekdays and 2 p.m. Saturdays), leaving as they fill up. The last buses will depart Amherst an hour before the games and will leave Springfield an hour after they have ended.

Eleven home games remain this season. The next will be Tuesday, Dec. 11, against Boston University.

In administrative actions at the meeting, the board voted for the second time in three months to raise the salary of University President David C. Knapp to $90,000, retroactive to July, 1983. The trustees had voted Oct. 3 to boost Knapp's salary to $92,500 retroactive to Jan. 1, but later reversed the action.

PLANT DISASTER—The inflow pipe seen here at the Oneida power plant in Poca Tello, Idaho, killed four men yesterday when it burst from high water pressure. The accident, which shot water more than four stories in the air, tore the concrete surface from the plant's east side.

More hostages released

Hijackers claim killing of US diplomat

Five hijackers said yesterday they had planted explosives in a Kuwaiti airliner at Tehran airport and would blow it up if a group of prisoners in Kuwait is not released, Iran's official Islamic Republic News Agency reported.

Earlier the Iranian news agency quoted the hijackers as saying they had shot and killed a U.S. diplomat who was a passenger. However, U.S. officials said they could not confirm that report.

IRNA, monitored in Nicosia, Cyprus, said the hijackers threatened to blow up the plane after the Kuwait government announced it would not accept any of the hijackers' conditions before the remaining hostages are released.

The hijackers freed 23 passengers yesterday, increasing to 67 the number released since the Airbus A-300 jet was hijacked Monday. There were 161 people aboard the Kuwait-to-Karachi, Pakistan flight. The airline said 120 of them were Pakistanis.

In Washington, State Department spokesman John Hughes said there were at least five Americans on the aircraft and that two—both women—had been released. Three officials of the Agency for International Development were aboard the plane, and Hughes said they were not among those released.

The State Department "can't confirm the name or nationality" of the dead passenger, but if American, it "could be" and AID official, Hughes said. He refused to identify any of the Americans.

Sterilization favored

WASHINGTON (AP) - Americans have dramatically changed their birth control practices in recent years with sterilization surpassing the pill to become the most common method of contraception, a new report based on government statistics shows.

"If male and female sterilization are counted as one method, then sterilization ranks first," among birth control methods, being used by 9.7 million couples, or 33 percent of those using contraception in 1982, according to the report "Understanding U.S. Fertility."

Published yesterday by the private Population Reference Bureau in Washington, the report is based on the National Survey of Family Growth conducted by the government's National Center for Health Statistics.

"Contraceptive practice has changed dramatically in the U.S. since 1965, with the rise and subsequent decline of the pill and the rise of male and especially female sterilization," the report states.

Overall, the study found that 29.5 million American women were using some form of contraception in 1982, 55 percent of women in the age group of 15 to 44, which is generally considered the childbearing years.

Birth control pills were the most common method among women, with 8.4 million using them compared to 6.4 million women who had been sterilized. But adding in the more than 3 million sterilized males makes that method more common than the pill overall.

The study was based on a national survey of 7,969 women. Similar studies have been done in the past, but comparisons are somewhat limited because the earlier reports concentrated on married women. The new study looked at all women in the 15-44 age group in order to learn more about those having children outside of marriage.

Reagan orders freezes, cuts, and eliminations

WASHINGTON (AP) - Declaring "we must get control of federal spending," President Reagan ordered his Cabinet yesterday to save nearly $34 billion next year through a drastic program of either freezing, cutting or eliminating all of the government's domestic programs.

The president's orders include tentative approval for eliminating the federal revenue sharing program to the states and phasing out all federal subsidies to mass transportation programs and the Postal Service, members of Congress said.

Reagan's list of budget cuts presented to his Cabinet also would eliminate the Job Corps and the Legal Services Corp. and phase cut federal subsidies for sewage systems, according to congressional and administration officials.

Only Social Security is exempt from the edict, which will require congressional action to fully implement. Reductions in the planned military buildup also are expected to be recommended.

According to a document White House budget director David A. Stockman used in briefing congressional Republicans, spending on literally hundreds of programs would be frozen at the current levels.

For other programs, such as the Small Business Administration and Community Development Block Grants, there would be deeper cuts.

Other programs would be eliminated or phased out.

In addition, the plan includes a phaseout of federal subsidies for Amtrak, the national passenger railroad.

Stockman told the Republicans that Reagan has not yet approved any cutback in the planned Pentagon buildup, although he has been asked to do so by both his advisors and congressional leaders.

"To reach our immediate goal in 1986, we must freeze overall program spending at the fiscal 1985 level," White House spokesman Larry Speakes quoted Reagan as saying during a 75-minute meeting with the Cabinet.

Dukakis announces plan to combat drug abuse

BOSTON (AP) Gov. Michael Dukakis, faced with evidence of widespread drug use by Massachusetts teenagers, announced a sweeping plan yesterday to fight the problem with "firm discipline," preventive education and counseling.

In a conference last night with educators from 18 communities from Lowell to Lee, Dukakis asked school officials to cooperate with a long-term program to educate students and teachers about drug abuse, counsel drug and alcohol users and punish drug dealers.

"At a time when Massachusetts is making enormous strides is our efforts to provide quality education for our young people and when our booming economy offers unparalleled opportunities for them, it is a crime to allow drugs and alcohol to keep them from taking fullest advantage of those opportunities," he said.

State officials also plan a long-range campaign, similar to its effort to combat drunken driving, to address the problem and maintain public awareness through the media.

To enforce "firm discipline," Dukakis said the state will map out a specific strategy with local police and district attorneys for dealing with anyone found possessing or selling drugs on campus.

The governor said he decided to launch the anti-drug program when he learned the "disturbing" results of a statewide survey conducted this fall by the state Department of Public Health.

Public health officials said the statewide survey was based on responses from 5,078 students, in grades 9 to 12, enrolled in 73 private and public high schools. The respondents represented 1.4 percent of all high school students in the state, increasing the reliability of the findings.

The study found:

-Ninety percent of the students said they had used drugs in their lifetime, and 31 percent said they had used them in the month prior to the survey.

-Twenty-eight percent said they first used illegal drugs at age 12 or younger.

-Of students reporting drug use, 51 percent used marijuana, 24 percent amphetamines, 19 percent "inhalants" like aerosol spray and glue, and 17 percent cocaine.

-Drug and alcohol use was highest in southeastern Massachusetts, Boston's North Shore and the western part of the state.

Brain chemical resembling opium may save lives of stroke victims

NEW YORK (AP) - Injections of a brain chemical resembling opium may save the lives of stroke victims by letting the brain quickly shuffle information out of damaged areas and into healthy nerve cells, a new study with animals suggests.

According to a report to be published today in Nature magazine, six of 10 cats given the drug survived massive, laboratory-induced strokes; 12 cats not given the drug died after similar strokes.

Half a million Americans a year suffer from strokes, in which bleeding or clotting disrupts blood flow to part of the brain, and brain cells in that area die.

There are no drugs now available to limit the damage from strokes, said one of the authors of the new report, Nancy Lee, a pharmacologist at the University of California in San Francisco.

The chemical, called dynorphin, paradoxically does not limit damage to the brain even though it alleviates the subsequent loss of bodily functions, Lee said.

She and her colleagues, including Yoshio Hosobuchi, a neurosurgeon at the University of California, found no change in the size of the damaged brain area or in the blood flow to the brain after administration of the drug.

The researchers are so excited by their findings that they are already preparing to ask the U.S. Food and Drug Administration for permission to try dynorphin with human beings, something that could begin in as little as a year, Lee said.

"At this moment, if anybody has a stroke, all you can do is keep your fingers crossed - and family members pray," said Lee. "We now have a handle to understand how brains survive."

French develop new pill

PARIS (AP) - French scientists say they have developed a pill to interrupt early pregnancies that may offer women an alternative to current abortion techniques.

The pill, known as RU 486, prevents implantation of the fertilized embryo on the uterine wall, the researchers say. Dr. Etienne-Emile Baulieu, head of the research team that developed RU 486, says the new pill produces "contergestation," a word he coined.

In preliminary studies, RU 486 proved 70 percent effective in interrupting pregnancies of less than eight weeks, according to findings made public this week. Used in combination with an injection, it proved 100 percent effective, the findings show.

The French Ministry of Health cautioned Wednesday that the studies were preliminary.

"The results confirmed that this pill used alone can interrupt pregnancy at its beginning and end it in 70 percent of cases," the researchers wrote.

"Practically no secondary effects were registered on the clinical or metabolic levels except ... a tendency for prolonged bleeding as well as several cases of important bleeding," the researchers said.

Flying Club offers inexpensive way to obtain license

By GREG BROWN
Collegian Staff

My palms were still sweating when I gave up the controls of the University of Massachusetts Flying Club's single-engine Cessna.

But the thrill of flying 3,000 feet over the Tower Library lasted longer than my thoughts about my best friend hitting the books inside.

The Flying Club, a registered student organization with 20 members, is a club that helps UMass students get their pilot' license for about half the normal cost of that endeavor.

Club President Jeff Pollock took me up yesterday afternoon, and after about 3½ minutes of nervously flying over the campus, Amherst College, and the Hampshire Mall, I was ready to sign the dotted line.

But the process of becoming a licensed pilot is much more complicated than that. Through the Flying Club, a potential pilot can pass the Federal Aviation Administration's requirements at a cost of about $1,500, compared to $4,000-$5,000, which Pollock said is the usual cost of lessons and plane rentals.

The club has a "pay as you use" arrangement with Northampton's LaFleur Airport, which gives it exclusive use of a red and white Cessna 152 airplane.

"I could never have afforded to get my license, but this way is so inexpensive," Pollock said.

The club has eight licensed pilots out of 20 members, and all of them got their instruction from FAA licensed teachers at LaFleur.

"Because we generate our own workers, we pay less for our plane," Pollock said.

The red and white Cessna sails past the Tower Library as hopeful pilots test their skills with members of the UMass Flying Club.

Pollock, a 24-year old geology major, said "This area is one of the best to learn to fly in, and certainly one of the cheapest for UMass students."

"It's easy to learn here because of all the flat farmland. There are no tall buildings around," he said.

The major cost of flying is renting a plane, Pollock said. But the club's members pay for their flights personally, and no money from student funds is used to finance the club.

The Flying Club's plane is inspected by a licensed mechanic after every 100 hours of use.

Pollock said the club welcomes students from the Five-College area, as well as pilots who already have their license "and want to keep in practice, or earn a higher-level license."

'Convincer' draws attention

Seat belt safety purpose of demonstration

By SANDRA DIAS
Collegian Correspondent

In an attempt to impress upon students and faculty the importance of wearing seat belts, the Student Health Advisory Board sponsored "The Convincer" demonstration yesterday, a public service of the New England Telephone Company.

"The seat belt convincer simulates an automobile crash under 10 miles per hour. It lets the person experience what it is like to be in a crash while wearing a seat belt," said John F. Spears, safety manager of New England Telephone Company in Boston, which sponsored the event. Spears is also co-chairman of the Massachusetts Department of Public Health's Seat Belt Advisory Committee.

According to Spears, almost 60,000 people die each year from injuries sustained in automobile accidents, and roughly half those lives could be saved with seat belts.

Seat belt wearing would also "eliminate about two million injuries per year and lessen the $44 million burden on the economy in terms of direct accident cost, hospitalization, insurance, and other costs," Spears said.

The Student Health Board, an organization formed in 1971, which serves as liaison between health services and the student population, brought "The Convincer" to campus in hopes of stressing "the importane of wearing seat belts," said Janet Rengucci, senior co-chairwoman of the board.

The demonstration is part of a nationwide campaign to promote the benefit of seat belt wearing and to pass a law making it mandatory. The state of New York recently passed such a law which went into effect this week.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts only demands such protection of pre-school aged children with the child-passenger safety law. This law demands car-seat or safety belt protection of children under the age of five with a $25 fine for violations.

Both the Massachusetts Department of Public Safety and the Student Health Advisory Board are advocating that a similar mandatory protection law be instituted for older children and adults, according to Spears.

The demonstration, which was moved outside because of the Craft Fair, attracted about 100 students and faculty members. Spears found that many of the participants who tried the "Convincer" claimed to be faithful seat belt wearers who had never been involved in a car accident.

"The impact of the 10 mile per hour jolt made quite an impression on the participants," he said.

Robert Genetelli, a junior legal studies major who participated in the demonstration, said, "I think the demonstration was good. I usually wear a seatbelt, but the simulated crash makes you realize what could happen without one. It reinforced how I felt about wearing seatbelts."

Blue Wall trys non-alcoholic events to determine interest

By JOHN VINCENT
Collegian Staff

Non-alcoholic nights at the Blue Wall will become the rule instead of the exception once the drinking age of 21 takes effect, said Campus Center Director William Harris.

The Blue Wall will kick off its non-alcoholic "un-bar" tonight with a "Clash of the Bands" in the bar's first experiment testing how profits will fare with the raising of the state's drinking age.

Five student bands and "Rock-a-Disc Entertainment" video dancing will begin at 8:30 p.m. during the first non-alcoholic night in recent history at the Blue Wall, said Campus Center Board of Governors' Food Service coordinator Geoff Polidero.

Tonight's "Dry Night" is an experiment to see how people will respond to entertainment without alcohol, said Alex Zucker, a member of the BOG Alternative Beverage Committee, which is sponsoring the evening with the Campus Commission on Alcohol and University Food Services.

Instead of alcohol, there will be a special list of mock-alcohol juice drinks and munchies. One drink will be the "Prohibition Hiball" made with grape, lemon and lime juices and grenadine, a non-alcoholic liquor, Zucker said.

There will be a $1 cover charge, but Zucker said "You could eat a dollar's worth of food in 30 seconds if you have any guts," and that people are sure to get their money's worth.

The winners of the "Clash of the Bands" will play for a whole night at the Blue Wall next semester. That night will also be non-alcoholic, with half of the cover charge going to the band. The Union Video Council will also record the event on video tape.

Non-alcoholic nights at the Blue Wall will become the rule instead of the exception once the drinking age of 21 takes effect, said Campus Center Director William Harris. He said the results of tonight's event will help to assess whether alcohol will be taken out of the Blue Wall altogether.

Harris said the Top of the Campus Lounge and the Hatch bar will be the main alcohol vendors in the Campus Center once the grandfather clause on the drinking age expires and forces all people 20 years old and younger to relinquish drinking alcohol.

Harris said dormitories and Recognized Student Organizations will be encouraged to schedule events in the Blue Wall at a greatly reduced rate.

The Campus Commission on Alcohol Use put up $300 for the night. The commission grants money for events that contribute "to the reduction of alcohol abuse and misuse," according to its grant application form.

BOG chairman Bob Abele said the board will hand out questionnaires to see what people think about no alcohol at the Blue Wall. He said the Blue Wall will now have to be opened up to student groups and dormitories for movies and functions, "because the bar will have to do something else" besides selling alcohol now that one more grade of UMass students will soon be unable to drink there.

Trespasser arrested in TOC lounge

A 66-year-old Amherst woman was arrested at 5:44 p.m. Tuesday at the Top of the Campus Lounge and charged with trespassing after notice, University of Massachusetts police reported.

Police said several employees had asked the woman to leave because she was bothering several patrons but she refused even after police asked her.

Police said a canvas bag and its contents, valued at more than $200, was reported stolen at 7:53 p.m. Tuesday from a hallway in the Fine Arts Center. The bag was left unattended in the hall.

Police said a pocketbook, containing $150 in cash was reported stolen at 4:17 p.m., after it was left unattended in the Campus Center Coffee Shop.

A bookbag, containing $100 earrings and $45 in cash, was reported stolen at 3:39 p.m. Tuesday from the first floor of Thompson Hall, police said. The bag was left on a seat in a lecture hall and stolen during a 5 minute period when it was left unattended.

Police said a backpack and its contents, valued at more than $100, was reported stolen at 8:09 p.m. from Boyden Gymnasium. The bag was left outside a squash court for 10 minutes, while its owner was playing racquetball.

Police said a purse and its contents, valued at $32, was reported stolen at 4:39 p.m. Tuesday from an unlocked study room on the seventh floor of the Tower Library.

Funeral home reports theft of second sign ; $475 rent check missing from mailbox

The Amity Funeral Home on Amity Street reported its sign stolen from the front lawn at 10:15 a.m. Tuesday.

The 24x36 inch sign was valued at $200 and police said this was the second incident of the funeral home's sign being taken.

A 21-year-old Amherst man was arrested Tuesday for three outstanding warrants.

The College Inn resident had defaulted on warrants for breaking and entering an automobile, malicious destruction, and larceny charges.

A 37-year-old Belchertown man was arrested at 12:30 p.m. Tuesday on charges of driving under the influence of alcohol, failing to stay within a marked lane, and driving without a license, police said.

Larceny was reported by a West Stret resident at about 11 a.m. Tuesday, when a $475 check made out for rent purposes was stolen from the resident's mailbox.

In a related action, the trustees approved a motion by member John Sweeney, a federal judge, aimed at clarifying responsibility for setting the pay of top school administrators. The trustees instructed the university to write a letter to the Board of Regents of Higher Education "reaffirming our responsibility on setting executive compensation."

Trustees Chairman Robert H. Quinn, appointed to the board by former Gov. Edward J. King, was re-elected to his post at the meeting. Quinn, of Milton, is a former state attorney general and one-time speaker of the Massachusetts House.

The trustees also approved a list of people to receive honorary degrees next spring from the University. Leo Monahan, a spokesman for the University's Boston campus, said the names of the honorary degree recipients were not released.

Lack of quorum prevents Senate from voting

By BOB BURGESS
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate, scheduled to vote last night on redesigning emergency on-campus housing policies, never officially met because a majority of senators did not assemble.

Many of the 52 percent voiced their disappointment at not having an official meeting. Last night was the second to last scheduled senate meeting this semester.

Among those upset was Brown House senator Stacy Roth, sponsor of a motion calling for "immediate negotiations" between senators and University of Massachusetts officials to redesign on-campus swing space policies.

"Everyone who is a senator has a responsibility to fulfill the needs of the students who elected them," Roth said, "and the University's swing space plan is something which every student should be concerned with."

The swing space policy provides emergency housing for students in dormitory lounges, music rooms, and areas and the Campus Center Hotel when regular dormitory spaces are not available. Roth has argued that this policy greatly reduces necessary study areas in dormitories, especially around final exam periods.

Roth said this is a "pressing issue because we must have something to present to the administration by the second week of March." Roth also said her task is now more difficult because only one more senate meeting is scheduled this semester.

Academic Affairs chairwoman Gayle Wintjen, who is also working on the swing space plan, said she wants a new policy ready for next fall's room choosing period.

Failure by the senate to meet its 57 member majority occurs more frequently near the spring final exam period, according to speaker Chris Sullivan, who said a limit must be set on the number of excused absences allowed senators.

Presently, no limit of excused absences exists.

Faculty salaries: women earn 83 percent of men

By DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

WOMEN IN FACULTY

A male professor earns $3,000 more, a male associate professor earns $1,800 more and an assistant professor earns $100 more than women in equivalent positions, according to statistics from the Personnel Office for academic year 1982-1983.

Editor's note: This is the fourth story in a five part series which examines the status of women faculty at UMass. Yesterday's story focused on tenure and retention.

At the University of Massachusetts, women faculty still have an uphill road to climb before they can claim they earn as much as their male counterparts.

A male professor earns $3,000 more, a male associate professor earns $1,800 more and an assistant professor earns $100 more than women in equivalent positions, according to statistics from the Personnel Office for academic year 1982-1983.

Anthropology Professor Sylvia Forman claims these salary differentials are "true on a national basis," and figures published by The Chronicle of Higher Education earlier this year concur that the inequality in earnings is not unique to UMass.

In the five college area, the Chronicle reported that a Smith College male professor earns $2,100 more per year than a woman professor; at Mount Holyoke College, a male associate professor takes home $1,300 more than his female counterpart; and at Hampshire College, an assistant professor will earn $20,900 if male and $20,400 if female.

Nationally, women earn only 83 percent as much as men in higher education, the Chronicle reported.

Experience a factor

Forman suggested that a substantial part of the salary differentials at UMass can be attributed to the fact that "the very top-paid people are the people who have been around the longest and they tend to be the white males."

Staff associate in the Office of Affirmative Action, Ron Sinacore, agreed that "experience seems to be the major factor" in accounting for the inequity.

But "experience" does not refer solely to length of time in a faculty position. It can also affect the salaries offered to entry-level faculty members.

As Sinacore explained, "If X has been in the field for 15 years and Y has been in the field for five years, a personnel committee is going to have to pay more to attract X that Y."

"There is a tendency," said Sinacore, "to always want the most experienced candidate," which means higher salaries must be offered. And men are usually the candidates who have participated longer in the academic professions.

Another explanation for the salary differential is offered by Forman, who noted that "women tend to dominate the less well-paid departments," such as education, health science and the humanities.

University competes with industry

But, she said, because university salaries must compete with earnings offered in the market place, "the best paid faculties are in engineering, management, business and agriculture." That is, faculties where women are the most scarce.

English Professor Arlyn Diamond contended that male salaries may be inflated because "the university will try to match an offer" made to a male faculty member who is offered a better salary elsewhere, but if the faculty member in question is a woman, the university is satisfied to "simply let her go," she said.

Diamond also suggested that male faculty are more likely to be appointed to temporary administrative positions than women faculty, and that they "take the money with them when they go back to work in their departments."

"They shouldn't," she added, "but they do."

According to Forman, the two major types of salary raises available at UMass may also contribute to the salary differentials.

One type, the "merit raise," is awarded according to the scholarly productivity of a faculty member: on his or her research, publications and so on.

Women do more advising

Most faculty members interviewed agreed that women's scholarly progress may lag behind that of a man because, as history Professor Joyce Berkman said, "Women often have to juggle the extra responsibilities of home, family and children," and tend to devote "much more of their time to teaching and advising." As such, women may be losing out on the merit increments to their earnings.

The second type of increase, the "across the board raise," is awarded irrespective of professional performance as a percentage of a faculty member's current earnings.

"If men are getting more or larger amounts of merit raises than women," said Forman, "then their across the board raises will go up too."

She suggested that "it is possible some of the difference lies in award of merit," and claimed that although departments "don't intend to follow a pattern like this they will end up showing discrimination."

Tomorrow's story will focus on the commitment to affirmative action at UMass.

Griswold said Santa is a symbol of the Christian religion, but has become secularized because of the "Christian onslaught on our society."

"When you're doing a thing like this (giving gifts in Butterfield), you'd like to include as many people as possible," Bernard said.

In the Secret Santa game, students randomly draw names and then become a secret pal to the person whose name they picked. The Secret Santa must give clues as to his or her identity while sending his pal on scavenger hunts or making him perform stunts to receive his daily gift. At a party at the end of the semester, everyone tries to guess who their Secret Santa is, and final presents are given out.

At Tuesday's meeting, resident Charles Bass said Secret Santa does not exclude anyone on the basis of "race or religion, because the game is not learned through any cultural system which deviates from their own."

Charri Boykin-East proposed a holiday party, "where the munchies are multicultural, and with educational materials towards the celebration of other cultures."

House Council member Dani Burgess motioned to table the discussion. The house council designed, in the words of Boykin-East, a "compromise celebration, and really a celebration of compromise."

"When you're doing a thing like this (giving gifts in Butterfield), you'd like to include as many people as possible."

—Lisa Bernard
Butterfield dormitory resident

Bernard said she especially liked "the idea of a multicultural event as a recognition and rejoicing of different cultures."

Other residents weren't satisfied. "I'm fed up with the minority pushing the majority around. I've come to expect having Santa Claus here (at Butterfield), and now it's been taken away from me. Some people have to make a cause out of anything. This time they've gone too far," resident Lisa Hickey said.

Also at the meeting, House Council member Matthew Shakespeare proposed giving money or tangible items to charity. "Why don't we get together (and make a gift to) somewhere else. With a little selflessness, a little caring, and a damn lot of love, we can do something together that will bring us the most satisfaction in the purest sense, because it (charity) is the most unadulterated," Shakespeare said.

The house council has not decided whether or not to send goods to Nicaragua, money to aid Ethiopia, the Boston Globe's Globe Santa, or to the Amherst Survival Center.

$7500 award for professor

By MARISA TORTOLA
Collegian Correspondent

A former University of Massachusetts professor recently won a $7,500 award in appreciation of her work to combat "female sexual slavery."

Kathleen Barry, who formerly taught women studies at UMass, founded the International Feminist Network Against Female Sexual Slavery, which fights abduction and forced prostitution.

"There was incredibile resistance to recognizing the issue—it was considered too radical. People don't like to see women working on the behalf of women," said Barry, who is now head of the sociology department at Brandeis University.

Barry organized a day meeting in April, 1983 for women from 24 different countries to fight this international and world-wide problem. They came together to develop unified strategies to increase awareness of the problems of female traffic and slavery, she said.

All the women have gone back to their countries with the commitment to place emphasis on organizing regional groups around the world and on doing more work on the crisis they were fighting in their own countries, she said.

The major difficulties in getting this meeting organized were financial ones, Barry said. "People didn't want to see this issue opened up—especially working from a feminist perspective," she said.

Barry was among 14 women over the age of 40 who were honored for their work on behalf of women by the New York based Wonder Woman foundation.

Barry is also the author of Female Sexual Slavery and is currently working on another book The Biography of Susan B. Anthony.

OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

Students do need the Coffee Shop

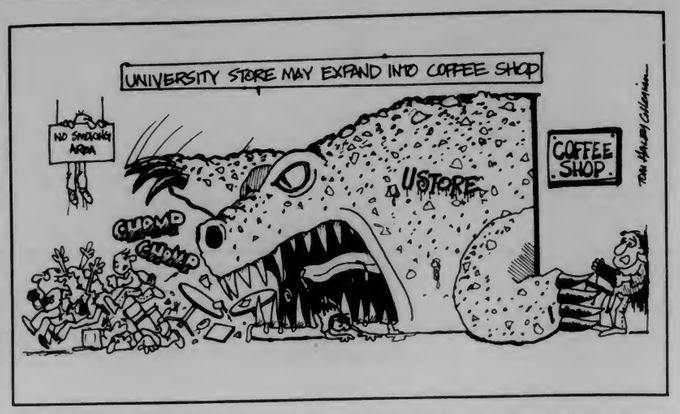
There are some issues about which students and administrators will never agree. The Coffee Shop issue is one of them. Right now there is a proposal being talked about (very seriously, I might add) which would replace the Coffee Shop with the clothing line of the University Store. Many administrators are in favor of this proposal. Stuidents won't hear of it.

Fran Hegeler

We pay $84 every year to the Campus Center. It's not surprising, nor unreasonable that we expect something in return. The Coffee Shop is a good example of what constitutes a valuable service to students. It offers a quiet alternative to the Hatch where we can study, have a bite to eat or socialize. More importantly, it is one of the few places on campus that an off-campus student can call home while between classes. It's one of the few "public spaces" on campus available for students. With 25,000 of us attending UMass, we're all too aware of the space crunch.

Imagine for a moment what the Hatch looks like at lunch time. It's packed. Imagine what the Campus Center is like on a rainy day. It's jammed. Imagine what it would look like without the Coffee Shop. Where would all of those people go? The Campus Center would be one huge traffic jam.

So why, then, do some administrators want to move the clothing line of the University Store into the Coffee Shop? As a result of the increase in the drinking age, the Campus Center stands to lose a significant amount of revenue in the loss of alcohol sales. The Campus Center needs to raise additional revenues to make up for those losses in order to operate in the black. All of the numbers, figures and charts indicate that this proposed change will raise the needed revenue.



What the numbers, figures and charts fail to reflect is the Coffee Shop's real value—It's study space, relaxing space, and breathing space. What is that worth in a dollar amount?

The potential loss of revenue is a real problem, and administrators have a legitimate concern. The proposed solution, however, is not legitimate. The Campus Center should take a different approach in solving this problem: improving other revenue generating areas of the Campus Center so that they operate at an optimum level. Certainly, the Blue Wall could be making more money. Certainly, the TOC restaurant could be making more money. Why not invest our time, money and efforts in trying to improve what we already have, rather than replacing a valuable service like the Coffee Shop?

So, once again we, the students, have to fight for our Coffee Shop. Once again, we have to assert the importance of our space. Once again, we have to demonstrate the strength of our collective voice.

Fran Hegeler is treasurer of the Board of Governors.

The General Education plan: A closer look

Gayle Wintjen

When weighing the pros and cons of both the present distribution and the proposed General Education requirements, the Academic Affairs Committee tried to place itself in an objective position. If we showed a bias in our train of thought, we ended up playing devil's advocate and argued its opposite. It is difficult to speak for every student but we feel this critique speaks for the majority, at least.

There are many positive aspects about General Education, some being the flaws of the current system. The present distribution requirements are not adequate in providing the well-roundedness the General Education proposal promises to. A student entering the University may have a pre-conceived notion of a field of study, without researching any other field. The enormous number of courses offered may allow a student to channel him/herself into a certain area, by choosing courses from the different fields of study that parallel each other. So many of these overlapping courses exist and the requirements have little clarity in their structure, that an enormous loophole exists, through which a student with vocational interest can slip. A second flaw of the current system is the way in which it is perceived. The fact that it lacks goal and clarity makes it appear as a nuisance to students, an obligation to be met, with the least effort possible.

How does General Education differ from the distribution requirements? From a student's perspective, General Education's better defined objectives and requirements are more understandable and therefore easier to justify. The student who asks, "What is the purpose of required courses?" receives an answer by the very diversity of the courses they are required to take. The student who asks,"Why should I have to take diverse classes?" need not look far for the answer. It is put forth very clearly and simply. It is the goal of the University not just to prepare a student for a career, but for life. In addition, today's employers are not seeking applicants rigidly learned in one area, instead, they prefer the well-versed individual with a varied background. Also, the student intimidated by this university's size and diversity will have a clear approach to seeking out an area of interest. A final positive aspect is the improved accreditation that may result from the more diverse course program.

General Education is not without flaws. This new proposal would slightly increase the course load for students, especially those with language and writing requirements. The analytical reasoning requirement poses a problem for the student entering at a remedial math level. This individual may be forced to take several courses in order to achieve a satisfactory math competency. An unfounded argument along these lines is the case of the engineering student whose course load is already quite full. The analytical reasoning requirement could be met by a major requirement and courses outside the math department which are analytical in nature such as statistics, logic and computer science. However, all students would have an increase in course load ranging from three to six credits. A question also exists in the case of double majors, double minors, and BDIC. The impact on these areas must be formulated before a final decision can be made as to the far-reaching effects of General Education.

The most crucial argument against General Education stems from the right of a student to choose. As stated earlier, a student must learn about life, not just a career. However, many students come to this university because of the freedom and diversity it offers, freedom and diversity by choice, not requirement. Students might view the approach of the University as "holier than thou" instead of the University's view of it being "in the best interest of the student." A student may feel that it is less diverse that the University would like.

In conclusion, the greatest flaw in the General Education proposal is the rigidity that may be perceived by the incoming student. This coupled with an increased course load may discourage an incoming student from remaining a University student. There is a need, however, to replace the current loosely structured distribution system. There is a genuine need to broaden the field of study of the UMass student. We feel General Education is an organized, well defined attempt to achieve this broadening. While many students may be apprehensive of the new requirements and while there are many unanswered questions that still remain, General Education is a worthy attempt to restructure an unorganized and little understood set of academic guidelines.

Taxation? No way

As I sat down to eat my "French Lunch" in the dining commons Tuesday, my wallet cringed as I read the headline "Students may pay meal tax." The state government gets its fair share of my hard-earned money while I am under the Educational Meal Tax Exemption. I was even more shocked when I read that local 1776 American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees is trying to solve the harassment problem by introducing state legislation.

I have seen the harassment President Tuttle is complaining about, and feel that action should be taken. However, Tuttle's solutions to the problem are unsuitable. He suggests that everybody, or nobody except in the dining commons, be exempt from the meal tax. His first suggestion is unreasonable because people from outside the University also eat at the Hatch, and TOC, and thus these two institutions would have an "unfair advantage" as Tuttle puts it. Restricting the exemption to the dining commons would be unfair to students (commuters) who are not on the meal plan, and wish not to pay the exhorbitant prices in the DCs.

I have witnessed harassment when the cashier included meal tax without asking if the person was a student. Students I know would not be offended if they were asked to present their ID, and this would reduce, if not eliminate, the harassment cashiers experience.

Any attitude problem at UMass should be resolved here, at UMass. I think that it is unnecessary for the cashiers' union to penalize other educational institutions by abolishing, or limiting the meal tax exemption here in Massachusetts. Besides, our state legislature is over burdened by important legislation that this state needs, so why take up their time with our attitude problems.

Santa, can you help me?

As I approached the large-bellied, white-bearded man in the red suit, he sighed, and without even looking up, asked "What would you like for Christmas, little..."

"How about letting me treat you to a cup of coffee, Santa?"

I could see the weight of a thousand two through seven year-olds slide off his shoulders as he hung up the "GONE TO FEED THE REINDEER!" sign.

"This is very kind of you," he said, warming his hands around the coffee cup. "These few weeks kill me every year. Smile. Be jolly. Ho-ho-ho. It can really be trying on a guy, even me."

Michael E. Wall

"You see, Santa, it's about this naughty and nice stuff. Specifially, I guess, about my 'Girl Wanted' sign."

"Oh," he said, turning on the counter stool to face me. "You're that guy. The thorn in the side of the young woman I spoke with last week."

"Yeah, you got it. But it..."

"Don't worry," Santa interrupted. "I was just kidding about that bad list stuff. I figured it would make her feel better. Nobody makes the bad list if their intentions are good. You see, I've had some runins of the same nature with a few of the elves. The way I see it, neither side is wrong or right. You have things to learn. You and I both know that the sign in your room that that woman referred to is one of many signs and posters in your room. I know that you mean as much by that 'girl wanted' sign as by the 'No parking' sign across the room. That's not the point."

"What is the..."

"The point is that she is fighting a battle. A battle for what should be hers and every other human being's:fairness and equality. It was all holy hell around the house until the reindeer decided on a rotation system for who would lead the sleigh. The thing to know is that she's reaching beyond what she wants in anticipation of being resisted and fought against. Now you. You are trying to hold on to the idea of chivalry. That's your battle. Fine. We both know that there's nothing wrong with being a gentleman. I always open the sleigh door for Mrs. Claus, and she loves it."

"You're right. So..."

"Just hold on!" Santa was getting stern. "The reason that works is because there is a mutual understanding. There is a compromise. I know that she can open the door by herself. She knows that I like to open it for her. If either of those two realizations were missing the whole thing would fail. She and I both carry the presents and both cook for the reindeer. See?"

"Santa!" I pleaded, "I don't think of women as china dolls, but she won't believe me!"

"That's my whole point," he said, buttoning up his coat. "She has to learn that about you, but you have to learn why her wants and beliefs are realistic and necessary, and why she wants and believes what she does. You're both good people."

Santa climbed off the stool and put on his cap.

"Just remember, Michael, the only time that it's wrong for you to do something for someone else is when you wouldn't let them do the same for you."

Marching band deserves thanks

Dear George, UMass Minuteman Marching Band, and Entourage:

What better way to usher in the holiday season than to have had the participation of the UMass Marching Band as the highlight of our "Celebration of Lights" last Friday night.

Your support for this community event is very much appreciated and we feel we have established a tradition of fine quality.

Amherst thanks you for your participation, good music, dynamism, good will, fine talent, synchronization, good humor (tuba xmas tree) and enthusiasm.

We are honored to have had the final 1984 performance of the UMass Minuteman Band in Downtown Amherst and look forward to many more cooperative efforts.

Many thanks and Happy Holidays to you all.

Respecting expression

"Congress shall make no law...abridging the freedom of speech/or of the press."

These few words from the First Amendment are the foundation of our society. Recently some people on campus have ignored them in favor of embracing their own view of a perfect world. Often, however, these same people quote this very source whose spirit they refuse to uphold. Recently, the Collegian has become a party to this behavior.

Rebecca Thatcher's column was allowed to refuse the printing of an announcement regarding the Miss Massachusetts beauty pageant. I am not arguing the questionable merits of the event itself, what I am arguing is the right of the individual to decide this for her/himself. Thatcher became so preoccupied with one facet of human rights, that our most cherished right was ignored: freedom of choice and of expression.

This brings me to Cliff Meyers. His act was both sexist and racist, nobody is arguing this point. The important thing is that Meyers' act was popular with many people. His brand of humor might not be popular with everyone, but does anyone have the right to censor him? Everyone's rights are being infringed upon when another viewpoint is disallowed. It is disagreement which allows us to confirm or to change our beliefs. Without this we would just stagnate.

The First Amendment is being censored. Some people may believe I'm being melodramatic, but that attitude is naive. There are places in this country where literary classics such as Catcher in the Rye, Slaughterhouse-5, and Huckleberry Finn are not allowed in schools. The attitude of "it can't happen here" is what enabled it to happen there. The Collegian should not allow such irresponsible journalism to take place within its own walls. It should stop the ludicrous goals of censorship. It takes an extraordinarily arrogant person to tell us what to do.

A new 'mall' at UMass

So, the University Store wants to take over our Coffee Shop. This is just what we need, despite the fact that the concourse is already wall-to-wall vendors. In light of this proposal, I suggest two other changes: first, let's change the name of the Lincoln Campus Center to "The Mall at UMass;" secondly, perhaps we should introduce a new course, "Shopping for Credit at UMass."

But seriously folks, the thought of depriving the UMass community of its most dearly-beloved hangout, a people, not profit-oriented place, is about as dumb as the proposal to build us a hockey rink (sorry Bruin's fans)—as Herter Hall, the Tower Library and other buildings on this campus decay.

P.S. Don't try anything over intersession.

Marriage: Indian-style

One particular phenomenon has always baffled me: the stark contrast between the relationship that an American marriage is becoming and the rock-like stability of a marriage in India. I came across this interesting story about an Indian couple, who have remained married for over 75 years, in the Tamil weekly, Ananda vikatan.

Chakrapani Iyer married Lakshmi Ammal when he was 19 and she was nine. The wedding took place in the Indian village of Vadakkancheri in the year 1908. Chakrapani is now 94 and Lakshmi 84. They live with their last son, Narayanan, in Udipi, India.

Seventy-five years is a lot of time, so Lakshmi does not remember her wedding ceremony very well. But old age will not force Mr. Iyer to forget the good old days of his wedding, it seems. He enjoys recalling his cherished memory of the events that lead him to this successful marriage.

K. Arvind

In those days, Indian marriages were made in heaven—at least as far as the bride and bridegroom were concerned. They had virtually no say in deciding who their life partner would be. Elders made this decision for them and said,"My dear boy, so-and-so is your wife."

Dissent was rare since this was the only opportunity for the dear boy to meet a girl. Chakrapani was no exception to this hoary tradition.

One sunny afternoon when Chakrapani was shopping with his uncle, they ran into a venerable old man. His uncle introduced the elderly gentleman to Chakrapani as his future father-in-law, and asked him to fall at his feet to seek his blessings. Chakra promptly did so. The future father-in-law blessed his future son-in-law and gave him a gift of eight annas (approximately five cents). Chakra had begun a life-long relationship with Lakshmi without ever having met her.

There is an old Indian benediction, "Bring forth plenty of children into this world and you will lead a great life." No wonder India has a population of 800 million today and elders of contemporary India refrain from blessing their children thus. However, our story dates back about three-quarters of a century, when having a lot of children was a matter of great pride. Chakra and Lakshmi have seven daughters and three sons. The eldest daughter was given in marriage when she was 12. Her mother was just 27 then. Lakshmi's first son-in-law was a year-and-a-half older than herself. Chakra and Lakshmi have 28 grandchildren and 32 great grandchildren. Two of their granddaughters have granddaughters themselves.

Today, Chakrapani Iyer is partially blind and almost deaf. But he is not afraid to face life. He derives courage from his secure marriage.

India has changed a lot over the past few decades. Child marriage has been banned by law. More educated women than ever fight for their rights. More and more people are revolting against arranged marriages. But one thing that has not changed at all is the stability of an Indian marriage. Divorce rates are extremely low; in fact if you ask a rural Indian about divorce, the odds are that he wouldn't have heard of the term. As it was mentioned in the Ripley's "Believe It or Not," shown on television some time back, sixtieth wedding anniversaries are commonplace in India. This interesting phenomenon in a modern educated society may be worth studying and investigating.

K. Arvind is a UMass graduate student.

Bottoms up, medic style

Tired of hauling heavy cases of beer to your room, at the risk of hernia? That miniature fridge you rented won't hold enough brew? I have a solution which would benefit the University as well as the students.

How much more convenient it would be for the UMass Infirmary to simply implant an IV into each drinking student's arm, through which beer could constantly enter the bloodstream? Each student would be assigned a portable IV rack from which pint plastic bags of his or her favorite brew could be hung. There would be Budallowance plans similar to the 12, 14 and 19-meal plans, and the University itself could rake in the bucks which would otherwise go to the local package store. As an added bonus, parties would become much easier to clean up after, and the risk of puncturing one's tires on the glass in the parking lots would be reduced to zip.

Why hasn't anyone thought of this before?

live wire

By PETER WISSOKER
Collegian Staff

I met my friend Jackson in the Blue Wall and over a beer we discussed whether loud, distorted music was the best. I said that there's a certain joy that comes with playing at huge volumes while Jackson argued that you can't hear music that loud. I think you feel it. So we sat back for a moment and stared off into space. "Robin Trower," flew off our tongues in unison. "Let's test it." So on Friday there we'll be at the Rusty Nail to check if Robin Trower plays loudly. Volume used to be one of his claims to fame; whether or not it still is or ever was a viable means of presenting music.

That's not to say that all good music is loud music, but what is rock and roll, or is this a new generation or something.

So what is there to do this weekend in live music besides going to see Robin Trower? On Thursday night Dinosaur will be playing at the Hatch for free. They are said to be really good. Also on Thursday night, The Good Guys are playing at Pearl St.

For a change of pace (perhaps as a warmup for Robin Trower?) you can go see violist Paul Neubauer at the Fine Arts Center. The tickets are only a couple of bucks so what do you have to lose?

Saturday is travel day. Northampton, Springfield. Accoustic duo Casselberry-Dupree, "original blues and jazz" will be at the Calvin Theatre. The warmup group is the wonderfully named Agitones. At the Zone in Springfield is The Neighborhoods, Eighth Route Army and Rapture of the Deep.

Let's see, that means Sunday. English Beat splinter General Public will be playing in our very own Student Union Ballroom which might make it worth going to see. Shadowfax, reputed to be pretty amamzing head music by people who like the Fripp-Sommers solo albums, will be at the Iron Horse on Sunday for two shows.

And Monday through Wednesday Taj Mahal, blues-folk musician, will be at the Iron Horse. We have three tickets for the late show Wednesday night to give away. Those who answered last week's trivia question (Martha and the Vandellas had a hit with 'Live Wire') say that the Bobs were really great, and these are people with discerning taste. At any rate this week's question is:What school did Taj Mahal attend? College that is. Come on, bring those answers down to the Arts desk at the Collegian or leave the answer in our mail box.

Spirited jazz in the FAC

By KENNETH B. ALBERT
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Jazz Ensemble I, under the direction of Jeff Holmes, put on a concert Tuesday night at the Fine Arts Center. The show featured Slide Hampton, a guest trombone player and one of the best known jazz musicians to play at the University this year.

The show opened with a spirited rendition of the Thad Jones song "Don't Git Sassy." The highlight of the first set, however, was the last song, "Thumbs," by Doug Walter, which features the entire saxophone section. Solos by Lisa Parent, Steve Gaudreau, John Balut, Geoff Mattoon, and George Weremchuk were sensational in quality and variety, while the upbeat ending, in which the entire section played in furious unison, brought the crowd to its feet.

The second set featured Slide Hampton, and opened with "In Case Of An Emergency," one of the many songs he has composed. He brought the crowd to life with his inspired playing in his arrangement of "Soul Eyes," a Mal Waldron song. The second set ended with another Hampton song, "New Thing," in which the horn section was exceptional. Their tight sound and clean licks were just perfect in offsetting the exuberant style of Hampton.

After the show, the band ran off to Campus Pizza, where they quickly set up and put on another concert. Between bites of pizza, Hampton commented on playing with the Jazz Ensemble. "It was a real beautiful experience playing with the UMass Jazz Ensemble. The attitude and enthusiasm of the kids and Jeff Holmes is just wonderful. We had a wonderful time together," he said.

Student art a "pleasure"

CHARLES FRANCIS CARROLL
Collegian Staff

If all the B.F.A. shows looked as good as this one, my guess is that there would be less controversy about using gallery space for Art Department crits. The current exhibit at the Student Union Gallery features works by Eric Taranto, Peter Staines, and Barbara Berger, who have used the gallery space about as well as it can be used. Simply walking into the gallery is a delight to the eyes.

As we enter the gallery, we are immediately greeted by several life-size nudes by Barbara Berger. The paintings continue around two walls of the gallery. Berger's large and varied array of paintings are impressive without being imposing. Her expressionistic style seems to attempt to mix the patterning of Matisse with the darkness and color of the Germans. And she succeeds!

Where Berger is most successful are her portraits, particularly Commentator. Not to take anything away from the bar scenes which are equally interesting, but rely more on the props of their setting than the figures on their own. However, the female nudes are slight in comparison with the rest of the work. While also a bit too cliche, the male nude is an exception: it is more honest, perhaps, because of the frontal perspective and mysterious because of what is not shown and the blue skin color, something hard to attempt in light of Picasso's Blue Period.

Much different than the painting is the direct-metal constructed sculpture by Eric Taranto. All of these works are ambitious, but one in particular, Javelin, succeeds in crossing a major threshhold of accomplishment for its creator. The achievement is not merely one of size, but of scale. This large work of steel seems to stand in air. As a javelin defies gravity with the force of its thrust, Taranto's sculpture, Javelin, does the same, its base not depicting the javelin thrower, but the force of the javelin once it is thrown. None of his other sculptured pieces have quite the same dynamic intensity, though some show wit, play, and a touch of lightness which comes as a pleasant relief with heavy metal.

The accompanying drawings and painting are typical sculptor's drawings, somewhat secondary in nature. Yet Taranto's contain nuances showing promise, such as the bird-like brushwork in one and the sphere in Energetic Tension.

The third artist in the group show is Peter Staines. Staines' works are more optical and contemporary, mostly composed of glass, mirrors, flourescent lights, and other substances. While many of his ideas are as brilliant as their optics, the craftsmanship needs to be refined in order for the pieces to really work. For instance, the acrylic painting on glass has many good points and interesting areas, but overall tends to be messy. Also, I don't understand why so many painters don't paint lines and use masking tape instead. Mondrian prided himself for not even using a ruler. This is not really a reflection exclusively of this particular artist, but my view of a general technique. I'm sure many people will like these works for their visual pleasure and interesting ideas.

The exhibit ends Friday.

A sci-fi satire

By COREY LEWIS
Collegian Correspondent

Buckaroo Banzai is a parody of the science fiction adventure genre. This is the story of Buckaroo Banzai (Peter Weller), a neurosurgeon physicist who doubles as a government test pilot and New Jersey rock star. He is joined by his crime fighting colleagues the "Hong Kong Cavaliers." Although their adventures are highly sophisticated missions they can be summed up in their own comic book series. The heroes are easily identifiable because they are all dressed like the characters from your favorite MTV video.

The film opens with Buckaroo Banzai finishing up a brain surgery so that he can rush over to the test sight and penetrate the eighth dimension through the side of a mountain in his high speed jet car. By penetrating the eighth dimension he unintentionally aids hostile aliens from planet 10 who first appeared on earth during Orson Welles 1938 "War of the Worlds" radio broadcast which the public had hastily passed off as a "Halloween prank."

If all of this sounds a little crazy, you're on the right track. It is crazy and it gets even better. After a successful run through the eighth dimension our heroes rush off in their high-tech winnebago for their gig at some New Jersey dive.

The film is full of circumstances which are reminiscent of The Spy Who Loved Me, Superman, or a space age Kung Fu. Buckaroo Banzai pokes fun at many of the conventions in our favorite adventure shows. The cast, too, is an unusual mix of characters that should be familiar to many. John Lithgow (The World According to Garp, Terms of Endearment) does a fine job as the repulsive Dr. Emilio Lizardo. Jeff Goldblum (one of the Hong Kong Cavaliers) carries the same verbose dialogue that we enjoyed in the Big Chill. Christopher Lloyd (Taxi) plays another bizarre character as the leader of the aliens.

The film does not pay much attention to detail but the skimming of everything is where most of the humor lies. If you try to follow everything you may miss most of it. Buckaroo Banzai is an enjoyable film, especially for adventure lovers, science fiction buffs, and most of all true connoisseurs of comedy.

A moment of madness from Buckaroo Banzai

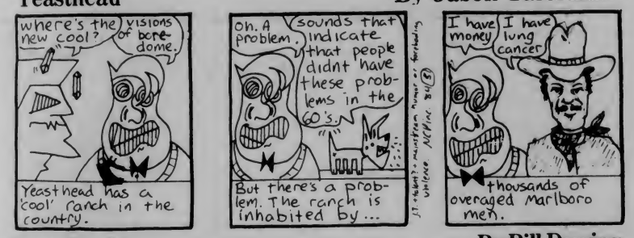
Yeasthead By Jason Talerman



where's the new cool? visions of boredome.
Yeasthead has a 'cool' ranch in the country.
Oh. A problem. (sounds that indicate that people didn't have these problems in the 60's)
But there's a problem. The ranch is inhabited by...
I have money
I have lung cancer
...thousands of overaged marlboro men.

The Nuclear Broach By NRC

During his flight, the premier only had the intention of learning more about the broach and if he could possibly buy some time to study it closer.
However, as he neared Rose's palace in her chauffered limosine, it occured to him that something evil indeed must be going on and that Queen Rosenburg must be directly linked to the mysterious deaths He freaked out.

Weather

Winter storm warning today. Cloudy with snow, sleet and freezing rain developing inland and mostly rain along the coast through much of the day with total accumulations of three to five inches in the Berkshires and an inch or two in surrounding areas. Tonight, cloudy, windy and much colder.

Highs today in the 30s and 40s.

finished with a 46.7 as an all-around man, and came in first in the vaulting with a strong 8.95. Ronayne looked good also finishing first in the floor exersize with an 8.8. He really showed his spirit as a last minute write-in in the high bar event. He came through without a warm up to score a third place with an 8.1, completing his unrehearsed set with a strait legged double flip half twist dismount.

Another pleasant surprise came from Eric Ciccone who also competed all-around rings. Special praise came and took first in the still from Johnson about Lew Wingert who finished an impressive 48.8 in his fist all-around effort.

excellent defensive team that can hurt you many ways."

Last Sunday in beating Boston University, the Minutemen used a ball control offense and a varying array of defensive looks to force 27 turnovers. If UMass is to win again, it will be essential to maintain a high level of defensive intensity.

"Defense has been our strong point thus far," Stevens said. "But they're (Holy Cross) all capable of scoring. I would expect they'll see us vary our defensive sets in hopes of keeping them off balance."

UMass is once again healthy with Susan Burtoft (sprained ankle) and Karen Fitzgerald (bruised elbow) back in action. Karen Daminger remains questionable for tonights game due to an illness in the family.

Tufts downs UM

Swimmers fall

By NANCY A. BUKAR
Collegian Staff

It was a tough meet to lose for the University of Massachusetts men's swimming team yesterday bowing to Tufts University 62-51.

"I would have loved to have won and we really tried but they beat us fair and square," said Coach Russ Yarworth. Missing two of his best swimmers, Steven King and Marc Surrette, because of academic committments.

"It went down to the last event," Yarworth said when the 400 freestyle relay team of Jim Flannery, John Piazza, Eric Schmidt and Craig Fuller placed second with a 3:20.91.

UMass started the meet off with a bang, winning the 400 medley relay with a time of 3:41.00. "It's the fastest in New England that I've seen," said Yarworth.

In the 1000 freestyle, Flannery finished first with a 10:23.72 followed by Paul McNeil in third place. Fuller placed first in the 200 freestyle with a 1:47.99. Mike Hoover, in the 200 individual medley, took first with a 2:03.65 followed by Paul McDonough in third.

The one event that really changed the score was the diving. Tufts took first and second with a score of 14-4.

In the 200 butterfly, Mike Minutoli and Chris Clarke finished one-two. The 200 backstroke was, "another event that hurt us," Yarworth said, when Jim Jacobson and McDonough took second and third. Rick Bishop finished third in the 500 freestyle with a 5:08.32 and Hoover and Tony Baker had a one-two finish in the 200 breaststroke.

Flutie's NFL career: Falcons covet Boston College star GB

SUWANEE, Ga. (AP) - Heisman Trophy winner Doug Flutie is becoming increasingly attractive to the Atlanta Falcons, who are afflicted with quarterback troubles and are likely to have one of the first three National Football League draft picks.

"Of all the teams that are up there in the projected draft order, we're the most logical" to draft Flutie, said Falcons General Manager Tom Braatz, adding that the Boston College quarterback "would be perfect for our offense."

The Falcons have a 3-11 record with three games left in the season. They are in the running for the first draft pick with Minnesota, 3-11, and Buffalo, 2-12.

But Buffalo already owns the NFL rights to a star quarterback, the USFL's Jim Kelly. Minnesota is interested in Flutie - he would be "like Fran Tarkenton revisited," said Vikings GM Mike Lynn - but trails Atlanta at this point in the draft order.

Despite Flutie's height 5 feet 9, he has impressed the Atlanta brass with heroics such as his miracle in Miami, where a bomb with no time remaining beat the hometown Hurricanes 47-45.

"Everybody in the world loves him," Braatz said. "Magic, whatever, that's what he's got. Somehow he gets it done."

The incumbent Atlanta quarterback, Steve Bartkowski, is nursing another in a career plagued series of knee injuries and has spoken more than once of retiring. And even when healthy, Bartkowski is not extremely mobile in the back field.

The Falcons are well aware that Flutie also will be drafted by millionaire New York developer Donald Trump and his New Jersey Generals, who have acquired draft rights to him in the United States Football League.

Undefeated Minutemen at UConn

UM's first test on road with Big East Huskies

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

The party is over for the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team.

After running its record to 2-0 with victories over Division II Stonehill (71-69) and winless New Hampshire (55-51), the Minutemen face the University of Connecticut tonight in Storrs at 8 p.m.

"I think this game will tell a lot about our team because UConn is a much better team than who we've seen so far," UMass coach Ron Gerlufsen said.

The Huskies, 1-1, dropped a one point decision to Minnesota after blowing a one point lead with 25 seconds left with a turnover. They pounded Yale 95-77 on Tuesday.

The Minutemen will have a size disadvantage under the boards with UConn going with what amounts to a four forward, one guard offensive setup.

Former Big East rookie-of-the-year Earl Kelley is the point guard. The 6-1 Kelley was effectively neutralized by UMass point man Carl Smith last season when UMass went into overtime to beat UConn 67-65 in The Cage. Smith tied the game with a layup to send it into OT before Donald Russell won the game with a last-second layup after a missed UConn shot.

At forward, the Huskies will go with 6-7 Ray Broxton, 6-7 Tim Coles, 6-5 Alvin Frederick and 6-9 Gerry Besselink.

"They are a good team far as having balanced scoring and decent quickness," Gerlufsen said. "We have to make sure our forwards box out on defense and take away their running game."

UMass junior Tom Emerson, who looked good against New Hampshire, may play a big role against UConn according to Gerlufsen.

"Tommy did some good things at UNH," the coach said. With the size UConn has we will need him to play defense and be an intimidator."

The Minutemen will start Horace Neysmith (12.5 points per game), Russell (13.5 ppg), Smith (11.5 ppg), Ron Young (7.0 ppg) and Bobby Braun (10.0 ppg) against the Huskies.

The Minutemen have had a rough start shooting the ball, shooting only 62 percent from the line and 45 percent from the floor. Some made free throws at UNH could have given the Minutemen a larger margin of victory.

"I think it's a early season thing and eventually it'll balance out," Gerlufsen said. "We're a good shooting team from the floor and line."

Senior forward Bobbie Braun looks to pass against Stonehill earlier this year. The Minutemen face UConn tonight.

The last time UMass won a back-to-back home game was in 1978 when the Jack Leamen coached Minutemen beat Northeastern and Vermont on the road.

"The Cage gave us a feeling of support and the students motivated us. On the road we experienced culture shock and suffered as a result. We didn't motivate ourselves. I think we've overcome that," Gerlufsen said.

MINUTEMEN MUTTERINGS: Last year, Neysmith, Smith and Russell had 12 against UConn...New York Knick assistant coach Rick Pitino has been helping the Minutemen recruit. Pitino graduated from UM in 1974.

Women host Cross

By JOHN A. NOLAN
Collegian Staff

Coming off an impressive victory over Boston University, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team is looking to win their second straight as they take on Holy Cross tonight at 8 p.m. at Amherest College.

Under the direction of head coach Togo Palazzi, one of the heroes from the glory days of Holy Cross basketball the Crusaders come into tonights game with the reputation for being well coached and physically tough.

"They're a big, physical ballclub," UMass head coach Barbara Stevens said. "Palazzi has a reputation for getting his teams well prepared."

Holy Cross, coming off a tough four point loss to George Washington needs a big win. Led by 6-4 forward Janet Hourihan the Crusaders put points on the board in a hurry. It will be necessary for the Minutemen to maintain their offensive composure and look for the open shot against the Crusader pressure.

"They will probably press us the entire game," Stevens said. "Basically, it will come down to our execution and not turning the ball over. They're an

UMass gymnasts stay undefeated, crush Lowell

By STUART GOTTLIEB
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team handily defeated the University of Lowell yesterday by a score of 248.05 to 199.55 last night in Boyden.

"There were no big surprises in this commanding victory" coach Roy Johnson said after the meet which he referred to as a "warm up for Syracuse on Saturday".

"I felt our performances were satisfactory but we will have to pick it up a bit for Syracuse". The coach also said "I can now safely say I am looking forward to Saturday".

The 2-0 Minutemen lead from the start and never looked back. They lead by 16 points after only the first two events, the floor exercise and pommell horse.

They continued on that pace throughout the meet, taking the first three spots on all events except the pommell horse, which UMass took second and third.

Co-captain Tony Sbarra looked strong after sitting out UMass's victory over Army last Saturday due to his previous engagement with the LSAT. Sbarra finished an impressive first in the high bar, ending his set off with a spectacular dismount.

The other captain, Ken Dougherty, looked good in finishing first in the all-around competition. His 50.15 was a solid way for Dougherty to get into the swing of the season, and to get up for the big meet against Syracuse.

Freshmen Rick Rourke and Jay Ronayne looked very well prepared and fared exceptionally well. Rourke

Just a few thoughts...

Everyone break out a shovel and start digging because the Pats are about to go six feet under. My, how typical. A game they had to win against a team they should have won, and they lose 33-10...Don't take anything away from the Cardinals, though. They have a good young quarterback in Neil Lomax and quite a receiver in Roy Green. The Cowboys and Redskins are showing their age so these Cards will definitely be a team to watch next year...One of the better nicknamed players was also a key factor for St. Louis; he goes by the monicker of Stump Mitchell. Now, Stump stands at about 5'6", but he's having an all-around great year. My question is is Stump used as a noun or a verb? If it's a noun, he can name his kids Stub. A verb, though, would force him to name his kids Baffle or Bewilder. If we all had these problems.

Playoff time is near in the NFL, and there are still a lot of spots open. The NFC East is a dog fight and, believe it or not, the Giants control their own destiny. Here was a team that only a few years ago had season ticket burning ceremonies before the season even started. Now, they are fighting for the top...Phil Simms has had a great year, perhaps a little over his head. Here's a guy who looks like he came right out of Mark Twain and he has a chance to go to the Super Bowl. He makes Terry Bradshaw look like a big city boy.

The Celtics finally lost again, as they bowed to Detroit. Larry Bird had his worst game in a long time. The Green shot only 42 from the floor, and they still only lost by five. The Celts and the Sixers will have more than their share of classic games before this season is over...You got to wonder about the city of Cleveland. The Indians are always last in baseball, only the Oilers will keep the Browns out of the cellar in football, and now the Cavaliers have gotten off to a 2-16 start. To put it simply, does Cleveland have a clue?

Baseball's winter meetings are under way, and there is already speculation that Jim Rice may be shipped to Houston. Now, the Sox desperately need a relief pitcher (left-handed, please), but the best the Astros can deliver is Frank DePino. Anyone who thinks DePino is as valuable as Rice still has payments on a DeLorean...In other news, the Mets signed coach Dave Johnson to a one-year contract extension, perhaps the best move the club has done in a long time. They are probably the best young club in baseball and Johnson will lead them next year all the way. I predicted that last year and I was close. So next year, watch out.

No more need be said.

Students clash in first snowstorm

UMass raids Amherst, 22 windows broken

By WILLIAM COLLINS
Collegian Staff

UMass students took advantage of three inches of snow Wednesday night to attack Amherst College in a snowball fight.

The storm began after midnight Wednesday. Snowball fights started in the Orchard Hill and Central Residential areas. Students from those areas then consolidated and formed a larger attack on Southwest. "Southwest reaction was positive," said Chris Dognazzi, one resident who took part in the Southwest defense.

After the skirmish in Southwest, more than 600 students took to the road to attack Amherst College. At Amherst College, students threw snowballs at the dorms, breaking 22 windows in the process. Damage was estimated at $400 by Paul Blanchet of the Amherst College physical plant.

No injuries were reported at Amherst College or at UMass and no arrests were made.

Windows were also broken in Brett House in Central Area Wednesday night. Fighting had taken place around Gorman and Brett before moving to Southwest. Several students were also attacking cars, a Domino's Pizza driver and PVTA buses that went by.

"It's typical and it happens every year," Tom Wortelbor, an off-campus resident at the snowball fight said. "It's a good way of blowing off steam."

Kerry Oberhauser, a Central resident said she was disappointed in the storm because she had hoped for more snow. "It wimped out," she said.

Several major radio stations had predicted that this would be a major snowstorm. However, on the average, only three inches of snow fell. Some schools were closed in the Northampton area, but the University was open and classes were held.

Assault on officer, thefts reported

By JOEL P. COFFIDIS

A 20-year-old University of Massachusetts student was arrested late Wednesday night after allegedly punching a police officer in the face, police said.

Police said the man was charged with assault and battery on a police officer, disorderly conduct and malicious destruction to private property. The student was arrested near Massachusetts Ave. during a snowball fight which involved hundreds of students.

On duty plainclothes police officers in the crowd saw the student kick passing cars and jump on a snowplow that was plowing on Massachusetts Avenue, ploice said.

A 1982 Honda, driven by a pizza deliverer, had its pizza sign damaged by snowballs thrown from a crowd of students involved in a snowball fight in the Southwest Residential Area at 2:17 a.m. Thursday, police said.

Police said at 1978 Chevrolet Camaro was broken into by a person using a coathanger. An equalizer, valued at $225, was reported stolen at 8:14 p.m. Wednesday, police said.

A third floor Crampton dormitory resident reported at 7:52 p.m. Wednesday that $180 in cash was stolen from her unlocked room between Dec. 1 and 2, police said.

Group protest of gay rights planned today

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Staff

A group of University of Massachusetts students is organizing a march to protest today's "Hug a Homosexual" booth sponsored by the People's Gay Alliance and the Lesbian Union.

The PGA and the Lesbian Union are co-sponsoring "Gay and Lesbian Day" today which includes informational tables outside the Hatch, a booth for a same-sex hugging there, and a dance and social later this evening.

"I don't care if someone's a homosexual, just don't tell me about it. If I want to find out about it, I'd inquire."
— Richard Gatnick

Richard Gatnik, a sophomore pre-economics major, said that he and ten to fifteen other protest organizers would also hang a dummy "representing the Gay/Lesbian movement" outside the Student Union Building after an organized match leaving the Southwest Residential Area at 10:30 a.m.

Gatnik said he has put up flyers promoting the protest rally in various campus buildings for the last two days. During that time, Gatnik said, he has received more support than resistance to the idea.

"One girl told me that (hanging a dummy) was a sick thing to do," Gatnik said, "and one guy told me I was homophobic."

"But I think a lot of heterosexuals don't support (gay rights). It seems you never hear from the majority. They never protest because they think they don't have to," he said.

"I don't care if someone's a homosexual, just don't tell me about it. If I want to find out about it, I'd inquire," Gatnik said.

PGA vice-president Bob Brigham said yesterday that because he has no federal or state legal protection of his rights "I have to be vocal. If anyone casually finds out that I'm gay, I could lose my job or my apartment."

"The implication of the headline ("HETEROSEXUALS FIGHT BACK!!" is printed on the flyer) is that homosexuals are against heterosexuals, and I think that's crazy," Brigham said.

Brigham also said that he finds hanging a dummy "personally threatening and offensive."

Profit loss doubted

BOG rejects move to abolish Coffee Shop

By JOHN VINCENT
Collegian Staff

The Campus Center Board of Governors unanimously opposed the proposal to change the Coffee Shop in the Campus Center into the clothing department of the University Store, but the board does not have the power to decide the issue.

Board members said students need the Coffee Shop as a place to eat and study. BOG chairman Bob Abele doubted the figure of $300,000 as a projected loss in the Campus Center from the eventual rise in the drinking age. The move is being proposed by a committee to find alternative revenue due to the expected loss. Abele said the committee wants the store to expand because of its high profits.

Director of the Campus Center, William Harris, who will have to approve the move before it can be implemented said that nothing has been decided yet and that he is open to student views. Harris pointed out that the BOG does not have jurisdiction over the Coffee Shop or the University Store.

"Those on campus from 11 a.m. - 2 p.m. can see that every Food Service area is full. The elimination of the Coffee Shop would mean lines waiting for food. The student population would not be served. There are a lot of ideas the commission hasn't touched upon...the business offiee of the Food Services feel they can operate the Blue Wall without a loss even after the drinking age goes up," Abele said.

BOG space coordinator Ron Homa said the Campus Center administration has "tried this before. When I was a freshman they wanted to put computers in the Coffee Shop, now they want to put in this clothing line."

Homa said, "The Coffee Shop gives students a place to eat and study, it has an excellent atmosphere. Off-campus students need that space. You can go in there and hang out. You can't hang out in the University Store."

Harris said that nothing need be done about it right away because the effects of the raising of the drinking age won't be that big until next January, 1986, because the new drinking law allows current 20-year-olds to drink and the privelege will not be taken away from those who turn 20 by June. 1985.

Carbide's value down

NEW YORK (AP) - The price of Union Carbide's stocks fell from $44.50 per share to $39.12 per share as investors considered the potential impact on the company involved in the disaster in Bhopal, India.

The company said its financial structure "is not threatened in any way" as a result of the toxic gas leak, which resulted in 2100 deaths.

The overall stock market would have posted a gain of several points for the day had it not been for the selling pressure on Union Carbide. The stock market hovered around the four-month low it reached in its previuos session.

Two rumored dead in Iran

WASHINGTON AP Two Americans, both officials of the Agency for International Development, apparently have been murdered by hijackers of a Kuwaiti aircraft in Iran, the State Department said Thursday.

The department said in a statement that based on information from Swiss diplomats in Tehran "it appears two AID employees have been murdered at Tehran airport."

However, the statement cautioned that "we cannot absolutely confirm that the murders took place, nor can we absolutely confirm the identities of these individuals and officially release their names."

Reagan to take cut in pay as symbol

WASHINGTON (AP) - President Reagan and Republican congressional leaders, embarking on a new drive to slash federal spending, indicated Thursday they would accept a 10 percent pay cut as a symbolic gesture aimed at making $42 billion worth of budget cuts more palatable.

"We have no alternative to spending controls. We must not spend one nickel more next year than we spent this year," White House spokesman Larry Speakes quoted the president as telling GOP leaders during a 90-minute White House meeting.

The president gave his Cabinet orders Wednesday to achieve $33.6 billion in domestic spending savings next year through a proposed plan that would freeze, reduce or eliminate some of the government's most politically popular programs, and cut the pay of all federal civilian employees by 5 percent.

Overall, Reagan has set a goal of reducing spending by $42 billion in the 1986 fiscal year that begins next Oct. 1, with the aim of holding total spending to current levels.

While generally supporting Reagan's objective, Republican congressional leaders kept their distance from the specifics.

"I think in a generic sense, the freeze concept generally sets well with the American people," said House Minority Leader Robert H. Michel, R-Ill.

"However, when you get to the individual specifics...my Adam's apple was regurgitated and I had to swallow it again on a few of these items."

The scope of the cuts Reagan is seeking to make at the outset of his second term recall the sweeping budget reductions that Congress enacted at his urging in 1981.

Michel noted that there was "much more fat" in the federal budget in 1981 than there is now, meaning these reductions will be more difficult to achieve, if all of them survive and are included in the proposed fiscal 1986 budget the president will send to Congress early next year.

TOC, Blue Wall patrons say good-bye to happy hours

By LORI KIRKLAND
Collegian Correspondent

Today is the last day to take advantage of Top of the Campus and Blue Wall happy hour prices as a result of the state-wide ban on happy hours that will go into affect next Monday.

TOC bartender Ken Whittaker says the banning of happy hours is a bad idea. "The law is penalizing a great many for the actions of a few," Whittaker said. He believes that the banning is especially unnecessary for bars like the TOC and the Blue Wall since few people need to drive after drinking on campus. "Students just go back to their dorms and cool out, they don't drive around," he said.

Blue Wall and TOC bartenders don't think the banning will affect business. "People come here for the happy spirit and company of their friends, not the prices," Whittaker said.

Blue Wall bartender Maureen Killay agrees with Whittaker. "The Blue Wall is a given on Friday afternoons. It's a tradition that won't be affected by prices," she said.

Both bars intend on serving some snacks in order to appeal to more customers. The TOC will design a sandwich menu offering french fries, potato skins, and veggie platters, Whittaker said.

Judie Terapulsky, owner of Judie's, has no objections to the new law providing bar owners stick together, she said. "A couple of our neighbors have plans of going to $1 drink prices regularly to get around it. There shouldn't be that undercutting. The competition should focus on promoting better quality and atmosphere instead of prices," she said.

"I didn't want to have a happy hour in the first place but once I got a bar I needed a way to attract customers," Teraspulsky said. Judie's happy hour sign was a recent addition to the restaurant but Teraspulsky has no intentions of keeping it. "I'm going to throw it in the garbage," she said.

Owner of Changes, Mike Kane, doesn't think that the new law is fair. "I think it's price-fixing, which is illegal," he said. Kane said that the banning would not affect his business as he has intentions of having lower prices on weekends, though the prices will have to be consistent.

UMass to remember Pearl Harbor

By TOM MIDDLETON
Collegian Staff

The UMass Republican Club is sponsoring a Pearl Harbor Day rally at noon on the steps of the Student Union Building today. The themes of the rally are remembrance and preparedness.

Following the rally, a wreath will be laid at Memorial Hall and a moment of silence will be observed.

"We will emphasize the importance of being prepared in terms of those who would wish to do us harm," said Stephen Erickson, president of the Republican Club.

"How do we promote our ideals and how do we make the United States more popular" are issues that will be addressed at the rally, Erickson said.

The rally will begin with an introduction by Erickson. A history of the Pearl Harbor attack will follow. Other speakers will address the "Soviet Threat", the "Terrorist Threat" and "Waging Peace".

Erickson added that he hoped members of veterans organizations would attend the rally but that he wasn't sure if they had been notified.

This rally will be "a lot less partisan and the elections are over" so there probably won't be any heckling from the crowd, Erickson said. Hecklers harrassed speakers and pulled the plug on the microphone at the last Republican Club rally, which was held before the national elections.

Erickson said that a demonstration against homosexuals might interfere with the republican rally because both groups are planning to be on the steps of the Student Union at noon.

Committment to Affirmative Action questioned

Editor's note: This is the final story of a five-part series which examines the status of women faculty at UMass.

"Their (Whitmore's) monitoring has been sloppy...people are getting away with murder on this campus."
— History Professor Joyce Berkman

♀WOMEN IN FACULTY♂

"Until the hearts and minds of faculty change not an awful lot of progress is going to be made."
— Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey

By DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

The current status of women faculty at the University of Massachusetts has made many faculty question the University's public committment to "equal opportunity/affirmative action" employment.

In particular, the administration has been accused of "sabotaging" the Office of Affirmative Action on campus by inadequate financing, staffing, resources and support.

In calling itself an affirmative action/equal opportunity employer the University is obliged to act in accordance with both Federal law and its own policy, both of which prohibit discrimination in employment on the basis of sex.

It is the responsibility of the Office of Affirmative Action to ensure these regulations are not being violated on campus and to "monitor departments for compliance," said Ron Sinacore, staff assistant in the office.

According to Sinacore, the Office of Affirmative Action acts "as a watchdog to ensure enough women are being hired" by, for example, "making a case to the chancellor and suggesting that a department head reconsider" if it is felt a woman has been unfairly overlooked.

Although the University has a regulation to prohibit discrimination and an office to bring to the chancellor's attention any violation of that policy, most faculty members interviewed agreed that both these provisions are useless unless the administration is committed.

English Professor Arlyn Diamond said the administration has not given the Office of Affirmative Action "the resources and power to do what they should." Until the office has that power, "the University will get away with not meeting its equal opportunity obligations."

James Boylan, journalism professor and head of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, believes "the administration at this University is not committed to affirmative action."

He described the current administration's attitude to improving the status of faculty women as "something less than serious."

"Some universities have bent over backwards to do affirmative action hirings," said anthropology professor Sylvia Forman, but she said she did not count UMass among them.

"This university has been weak in its efforts," she said. As a result, "some departments are conscious about affirmative action and some are not," Forman said.

History Professor Joyce Berkman said she has been "very disappointed with the Office of Affirmative Action in recent years."

"Their monitoring has been sloppy," Berkman said, and consequently, "people are getting away with murder on this campus."

She contended that the office has been "sabotaged" by inadequate financing, staffing, resources and support by the administration.

Asked if she felt the office had been sabotaged, its Director, Thelma Griffith-Johnson, replied "no comment."

But she suggested that a telling measure of the administration's committment could be deduced by understanding the history of the office.

The Office was created in 1972 by Chancellor Ralph Bromery as a decentralized body. Each vice-chancellor was responsible for his own affirmative action policies and goals and was accountable to the chancellor.

In 1980, Bromery was succeeded by Henry Koffler, who centralized the office in 1981 to check on departments and report back to the chancellor if discriminatory practices were suspected.

In 1982 Griffith-Johnson was called in to direct the office and oversee the process of centralization.

Since then, Griffith-Johnson has been "pulling it all together," she said. But when the office was centralized, the number of employees was reduced from 23 professionals and an entire support staff to three professionals and one staff, Griffith-Johnson said.

"Three professionals and one staff to monitor and train the entire university," said Griffith-Johnson. "Now tell me if I'm understaffed."

She also complained that the office had been undermined by a lack of "consistent leadership" and no "continuum at the administrative level," because of the high turnover of senior administrators.

"When an administration is unsettled everyone does as they pretty much please," Griffith-Johnson said. She cited as an example her belief that "anti-feminists" were allowed to go back to "their malicious ways."

But she believes that "with some real dedication for the cause of women faculty things will start to move again."

In her view, what is needed to get things moving is "committment from the chancellor" in the form of "visible, continual, day to day reinforcement of the principles of affirmative action."

"We hope that with a chancellor who will stay a while," she said, "there will be consistency and authority that didn't exist before."

"You can't just lay this on the administration's doorstep," said Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey, and added "it is a mistake on this campus to think it is the administration's problem."

Duffey contended that this is an area where "until the hearts and minds of faculty change not an awful lot of progress is going to be made."

Duffey said he is now "discussing the role of the affirmative action office and asking questions about how it can be made more effective."

"One of the things I will do is to make affirmative action records more a part of the evaluation of administrators on this campus," he said.

He also said the provost recently announced to the Faculty Senate Rules Committee "a reverse of positions for affirmative action recruitment."

Asked what priority he gave to improving the current status of faculty women Duffey replied, "I will feel I haven't done my job if over the next five years there is no progress in this area."

But, he said, "if the situation doesn't get better I will realize that it is not totally mine to control."

According to James Boylan, the administration has judged the current political climate as "one in which affirmative action doesn't have to be pushed any more."

And Griffith-Johnson believes that, reflecting the present political climate, the administration "makes committments and then forgets them when they become too costly."

The University has "forgotten its committment to women, to blacks, and to all people who have been historically left out," he said.

WINTER WONDERLAND — University students walk past campus pond yesterday afternoon as ducks in the foreground gather on the ice.

Scholastic aid ban for unregistered may pass

BOSTON (AP) - Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, who has strongly opposed a bill that would ban state scholarship aid for students who fail to register for the military draft, reportedly plans to allow the bill to become law Monday without his signature.

"The governor is taking a hard look at what the practical impact of the legislation is in light of two things. One is the decision of the U.S. Supreme Court which has held it is legal to do this, as far as it relates to federal scholarship aid. Secondly, the way in which federal and state scholarship funds are administered in the commonwealth," press secretary James Dorsey said Thursday.

The bill, which would affect an estimated $24 million in state scholarship assistance, was approved by the House in June by a 93-51 vote and in the Senate last month on a voice vote. It states that students who fail to register with the Selective Service system, as required by federal law, cannot receive state aid for higher education programs.

Dukakis and other opponents have argued the measure would only affect young men who need financial assistance, would those who are well-off financially would get an education regardless of their refusal to register for the draft.

The governor also feels the bill denies students due process of law and takes away their Fifth Amendment right of protection against self-incrimination.

However, the U.S. Supreme Court last summer ruled that a similar federal statute was constitutional.

'No school' hotline available

A 24-hour answering machine has been installed in the office of Administrative Services to allow students to find out if classes are cancelled due to a snowstorm.

According to Mary Beth Calpp of the Administrative Services Office, the machine was installed to alleviate the number of calls to the main campus information number.

The machine is in constant operation. The tape recording tells callers that the University and library are open and that the bus service is in operation on days when classes have not been cancelled.

The number to call for the answering service is 545-3630.

Activist to speak on S. Africa

A South African theologian, scholar and civil rights activist will speak on "Human Rights in South Africa," Saturday at 8 p.m. in the Unitarian Church in Northampton.

Richard Stevens played a role in raising the consciousness of Blacks in South Africa.

The event is sponsored by the Amherst and Northampton chapters of Amnesty International to commemorate Human Rights Week and its Campaign Against Torture. Saturday's events will include brief presentations by South African students from the five college area and a presentation on women as victims of torture.

As a result of Steven's political and social beliefs, he has been harassed, interrogated and imprisoned by the internal security police of South Africa. In 1980, he was held in solitary confinement for six months, becoming an Amnesty International "prisoner of conscience."

Mediator training in January

The Mediation Project at the University of Massachusetts is planning to hold its annual training for mediators in January 1985. Applications for training, a 21-hour comprehensive and intensive program in the techniques and skills of mediation, are now available from the Project office.

Mediation is an alternative and voluntary means of resolving disputes and conflicts. In mediation, all parties to a dispute are given the opportunity to participate actively in the settlement of their problems without being involved in a formal judicial or disciplinary process. Mediation requires the participation of two mediators who are impartial and non-judgmental and whose primary role is to promote agreement. They have no authority to impose a settlement.

Free influenza shots offered

The University Health Services is offering free influenza immunizations to University of Massachusetts students and employees.

The Public Health Service and University Health Services recommends annual immunizations against influenza for those with chronic illnesses such as heart disease, pulmonary disease, chronic renal disease, and metabolic disorders including diabetes.

They also recommend annual immunization for individuals over the age of 65.

Vaccinations may be received by making an appointment through the immunization clinic at the University health Services.

Contraceptives: UMass offers benefits, but they take time

By LORI KIRKLAND
Collegian Correspondent

Less than ten years ago, the condom and spermicidal foams and jellies were the only legally available contraceptive devices to unmarried people.

Today, methods such as the Pill, intrauterine device (IUD), and diaphragm are not only legally obtainable to all, but are available through University of Massachusetts Health Services for nominal fees.

According to Pam Gonyer, contraception programming coordinator at UHS, students interested in acquiring doctor-prescribed contraception must attend educational sessions before a physical exam is scheduled.

"The session is provided to help students choose the best method for them and inform them on related topics," Gonyer said. "By in large, the reaction to the session is overwhelmingly positive," she said.

"Deciding to have intercourse is not an emergency, it's a developing thing and an important decision that bears some thought and consideration."
— Pam Gonyer

A major problem women face at the Health Services is the often long wait, "sometimes two weeks," for an exam, Gonyer said.

"Some people think that coming in for contraception is an emergency. Their boyfriend is coming up and they become frantic because they can't go on the Pill this weekend. They often don't think about it far enough ahead of time.

"Deciding to have intercourse is not an emergency," said Gonyer, "it's a developing thing and an important decision that bears some thought and consideration."

Another problem is that some students are offended by the educational session. "Some people come in with more sexual experience or knowledge than others," Gonyer said. "Those people occasionally become frustrated because they have to attend the session which they believe unnecessary," she said.

The obvious problem occurs when either the contraceptive method is not effective or a student doesn't seek any contraception in the first place and is faced with an unwanted pregnancy. In this instance, the Health Services can help students decide what steps to take and then help them plan either an abortion or obstetric care.

Ma. leads nation in economic boom

BOSTON (AP) - The nation's current economic boom was led by the New England region, which should continue to see strong growth over the next year, the chief economist for Dun & Bradstreet Corp. told a meeting of the region's bankers Thursday.

Despite recent declines in national economic indicators, economic activity in Massachusetts and the rest of New England remains high, according to Joseph Duncan.

Construction also remains strong in New England, particularly Massachusetts, Duncan said.

"Dipscam" cases continue

Bogus diploma recipients as many as 7,500

OREGON (AP) - An FBI investigation of an Oregon man accused of issuing counterfeit diplomas from some 300 universities could lead to the exposure of about 2,500 people who may be practicing law or medicine or holding other jobs under false pretenses.

The case against Dennis Everett Gunter, 38, of Grants Pass, Ore., is the sixth resulting from the FBI's 4-year-old nationwide "Dipscam" investigation into phony diploma mills.

But Gunter, scheduled for arraignment in federal district court in Eugene, Ore., Dec. 19, is the first accused of selling bogus degrees from actual universities and colleges. The five earlier cases involved fictitious schools issuing phony degrees and college transcripts.

According to a seven-page indictment handed up last August, Gunter charged customers from $39.95 to $64.95 for counterfeit diplomas and degrees from schools including Harvard, Penn State, University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill, North Carolina State, the University of Michigan, Michigan State University and the University of Colorado.

The indictment alleged that between December 1982 and June 1984, Gunter sold certificates and degrees to approximately 2,500 people.

U.S. Attorney Tom Coffin of Eugene said that "it's possible" the names of purchasers of phony diplomas might be entered into evidence in the coming weeks, perhaps in a sentencing memorandum. The names would thus become part of the public court record.

"If that occurs, it would be the first time any purchaser's name would be on the public record," said Robert L. Pence, special agent in charge of the FBI's North Carolina office, which has run the Dipscam investigation since it began in 1980.

Pence said that in the previous five Dipscam cases, all of which led to guilty pleas and convictions, names of purchasers "were furnished only to state authorities or licensing authorities for possible action."

Gunter allegedly operated a firm called "Alumni Arts" which placed ads in magazines and tabloids, including Rolling Stone, Moneysworth, Soldier of Fortune, Science Digest and Psychology Today.

An FBI investigator said that after agents confiscated Gunter's records, they checked with the registrars of the University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill and North Carolina State University whether individuals had purchased diplomas from those schools from Gunter had ever graduated.

Big Twist & Co: lively blues

By JACK BRESNAHAN
Collegian Staff

UPC Productions and the Blue Wall hosted another fine Chicago based blues band on Monday night. This time it was Big Twist and The Mellow Fellows that gave the crowd their money's worth. Though relatively unknown in this area, they easily won over an enthusiastic audience with their brand of boogie.

The band began about 15 years ago when alto sax player Terry Ogolini took guitarist Pete Special to Evansville, Indiana, 300 miles south of Chicago, to see Big Twist. He was drumming at the time in an "all purpose band" in some pretty rough clubs. The three soon after formed a band and they've been together ever since. Though their influence is primarily old blues, they also work soul and rock into their repetoire. They are third generation bluesmen, playing traditional blues the way they feel, in a more contemporary style. This approach is comparable to The Nighthawks and The Fabulous Thunderbirds, and contributes to their commercial success. Also working in their favor is producer and co-songwriter Gene Barge, longtime with the Chess blues record label, who has worked with greats like Little Walter and Chuck Berry.

The Mellow Fellows started the show with the "Theme From Dragnet," and I could tell right away that we were in for some great music. After another fine instrumental, Big Twist took the stage. Singing in a voice like Willie Dixon, Howling Wolf, and BB King combined, he began with the boppin "Funky Tom's Place," and then a blues number, "Nobody Wants To Lose." This featured great guitar and meshed horns that got people up there dancing at once.

Next came "Street Party" (in the baddest part of town), which sounded like it has great marketing potential. "Steamroller Blues" rolled all over the crowd with slow and powerful vocals, gaining momentum with leads by Pete, long-held notes from the horns, keyboards by Sid Wingfield, and back down to a soulful vocal ending. Remembering the bright city lights and the sweet sound of R&B got people going on "Sweet Soul Music," as well as "Pouring Water on a Drowning Man." On that one, Twist gave a discourse on love and mouth-to-mouth resucitation, adding, "Anybody who don't like to be loved is dead!" This was followed by Willie Dixon's "300 Pounds of Heavenly Joy," and "Flip Flop," from their new album, Playing For Keeps.

Set two began with "Candy," composed by keyboardist Sid. This was followed by Mudcat, a cooker with a big full sound, with Freddie King-like leads and scat with the organ and keyboards. Then Big Twist came on with a rocking "Let The Good Times Roll," and "Cold Women With Warm Hearts." After the extended applause on that Twist concurred, "Boy, do you have great taste." Saxaphonist Terry Ogolini had a great solo on "Just One Woman," which was followed by a boogying "You And Me," from their first album. Songs like "City of New Orleans" by Steve Goodman and "Who's Cheating Who," by Little Milton, preceded Tyrone Davis' "If I Could Turn Back The Hands Of Time." Favorable mention should be made to the rhythm section of drummer Mike Arturi, who's surprisingly only been with the band two weeks, and Twist's lively nephew, Tungo West, on bass. The show ended up with "Sweet Home Chicago," and "Polk Salad Annie," the final encore.

This band has everything it takes to make it, talent, commitment, and momentum. Big Twist is a hell of a showman. He's superb with the audience, and is jovial off-stage as he is on. Talking to him after the show, I found him a walking talking blues documentary. Recalling songs by Jimmy Reed, he also told some first-hand stories of Howlin Wolf and did an eerily authentic impersonation of him. Big Twist is a man with a past that works for him, and who's time has come. I hope that we see him soon again.

Heechee Rendezvous

Heechee revealed

By WILLIAM COLLINS
Collegian Staff

The long-awaited conclusion of Frederik Pohl's Heechee trilogy, Heechee Rendevous, is finally out, and the mysterious aliens are finally explained.

Over 500,000 years ago the Heechee visited Earth. They left strange artifacts behind, including a giant asteroid filled with spaceships. Humans found them and started to explore the galaxy.

The Heechee are some of the most interesting aliens in science fiction. They had a higher technology than mankind 500,000 years before today, yet they ran away and hid inside a black hole. When they do come out, it is to warn mankind of a great danger.

The focus throughout Pohl's trilogy is the characters. Robin Broadhead changes over the years. He goes from a guilt-ridden prospector to an entrepreneur. However, his conscience forces him into one last voyage into space to meet the Heechee.

The major character in the series, Robinette Broadhead, started out in the first book an impoverished, troubled fortune-hunter. By the time of Rendevous, Robin Broadhead has becopne one of the wealthiest men on Earth.

The one major problem with the novel is the comments that are thrown in every thirty pages or so. These are little digressions by Albert Einstein, Robin Broadhead's personal computer program. Unfortunately, these blurbs cause the reader to lose his train of thought. Worst of all, they give away the plot.

Albert Einstein, commentaries aside, is one of the most interesting characters in the book. For one, he is a computer program, yet he behaves exactly like he was a real person (and he thinks he is). He even has a nervous breakdown.

In the earlier books, Gateway and Beyond the Blue Event Horizon, Pohl left tantalizing hints about the Heechee. This novel finally reveals them and includes a description of just what the aliens look like. Surprisingly enough, they turn out to be more human than many other science fiction races.

The writing is crisp and clear. The plot takes time to get moving, because Pohl takes the time to develop the characterization and situations leading up to the meeting between human and Heechee. In places it drages, but it doesn't have the long rambling conversations of the earlier books.

An interesting, entertaining novel, Heechee Rendevous is the best of the three. The only enigma left is exactly who the creatures are that the Heechee fled from...

A roadtrip to sexism from cover to cover

Mary Cresse

It's no secret the casting couch isn't exclusive to Hollywood; Princeton undergrads Seth Rachlin and George Van Hoomissen prove it exists in publishing too, only what they did to whom to get their book published is less a mystery only to what extent they lowered themselves.

Specifically: Where The Girls Are Today: The College Man's Roadtrip Guide to All Women's Colleges. Now if the title isn't enough to make even the most inactive feminist tear off the Seventeen-like cover and send the mangled pieces to Crown Publishers, it'll inspire authorship in anyone who can write a noun-verb-noun sentence.

The sole premise of the "guidebook" is to steer modern-day cavemen to the "best" of women's colleges, where, if one is lucky, one can find bubbleheads ready to abandon their virginity and self-respect to people who obviously took seriously the "Wild and Crazy Guy" skits on Saturday Night Live.

Besides continually referring to college-age women as "girls," the boys (it's only fair, isn't it?) use the popular "catch" a "fish" metaphor commonly ascribed to women.

Go ahead, laugh. This is the book to buy if you have extra time and gas and want to get laid. That's right — get laid. Have sex.

Surprised by my language? I don't like to use it, but why should I be euphemistic if Rachlin and Van Hoomissen prefer to be blunt?

On Smith: "...while a significant group of girls claim to have gone to Smith to get away from men, most Smithies feel more sympathy with their classmate who said she missed the presence of men only when she was awake." Doubtless the boys didn't hesitate to ask how she felt at nighttime.

On Regis College: "Be advised. There is a strong contingent...on the prowl for husbands...So don't get too drunk and make promises you can't keep."

Sometimes they prefer innuendo: on Wheaton College: "As a roadtripper...you've seen a lot of women in your travels. Some, we're sure, were women at their best, some pretty good, and only a few at their average."

"The book should be taken in a lighthearted way," says co-author Van Hoomissen. "Naturally, we made some generalizations but you can't escape that in writing a book. It's not so much a social book as a travel book, anyway, and maybe we said things that weren't appropriate, but you must understand we were trying to sell a product."

Just what were you trying to sell, George?

Rachlin told one Collegian reporter that one shouldn't "hyperanalyze" the work of a couple of guys "just trying to have a little fun."

The sole premise of the 'guidebook' is to steer modern-day cavemen to the "best" of women's colleges, where, if one is lucky, one can find bubbleheads ready to abandon their virginity and self-respect to people who obviously took seriously the 'Wild and Crazy Guy' skits on Saturday Night Live.

What they both forget is that not only do women want to have a good time as much as men, women do not think of marriage every time they see a pair of trousers. Most signficantly, the authors forget that many things originally intended in a "light hearted" way end up in situations far more serious. Just ask five men in a jail in New Bedford.

The text is peppered with pictures of lounging women holding books but looking also shyly, demurely, helplessly at the camera — put a lollipop in their mouths and tell them to put a leg on a chair and they would make the January issue of Playboy.

By alternating these photos with chapters entitled "Nubile New England," "Manic Mid-Atlantic," "The Siren South," "The Mischievous Midwest" and "The Wistful West," the authors evidently want to foster a sort of commisseration among socially unsuccessful or awkward males. There is even a section devoted to women's colleges that have gone co-ed; it is treated with mock solemnity, as if by associating with men, women will develop their brains and thus realize the stupidity of socializing with two men using their bodies as divining rods to find the "prettiest" women in the nation.

There are three pages of acknowledgement, comprising almost totally women's names. Why, George, did they deserve thanks?

"They filled out a questionaire."

Oh. Was there anything else, maybe? Did you —

"I think that's a very personal question. I decline to answer."

That's your privilege, George. But let me answer your initial question. Where are we, George?

We're in the House, we're in the Senate; we run Newsweek and The Washington Post; we organize major national political campaign as well as rear children.

It's ironic, in your study of the most primal — and bovine — of tendencies, that you went to colleges, where women prepare their minds, not their bodies. Maybe you would have been more successful had you hung out on 42nd St.

A few holiday greetings

William J. Spain

This is the time of year when most of us remember all those who touch our lives in a positive manner. Many use Christmas cards to let special people know that they have not been forgotten. I decided against that method this year and have instead opted to use this space. Not only will this get the ones on my list the public recognition they deserve but I also save a bundle on postage.

So much for the introduction. I would like to wish the following individuals and groups the merriest of holidays and the happiest of New Years.

Big Twist. Thank you for bringing the biggest smile in the world to the Blue Wall. Your piece of Chicago will always be welcome in my Amherst.

Garry Trudeau. Damn, it is good to have you back. The comics page just wasn't the same without you. Say hello to Jane and the twins for me, too.

Victor Gerena. I toast your success in eluding capture. Maybe someday I will run into you in some tropical paradise. Until then, best of luck to my favorite "seven-million-dollar man".

Larry Bird and the Boston Celtics. If you guys had lost to the Lakers, I don't know what I would have done. That would have been worse than the Reagan landslide. At least a few of those overrated Californians have been put in their place.

Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro. I have a lot of respect for anyone who tries to run a political campaign based on issues. It takes a lot of guts to do that in a time when slogans and make-up are far more important. No reason for you two to feel bad when you gave it your best shot.

The Sierra Club and all other environmental organizations. Keep it up, folks. Without you, the corporations would turn our national parks into shopping malls in no time. My furry friends also send their best.

My fellow history majors. It makes me feel better to know that some other people come to college to get an education instead of a vocational skill. I look forward to long years of discussing ancient Greek culture over the grill at McDonald's with you.

All the couples who adopt mentally or physically handicapped children. I wish that I had your courage and kindness.

Everyone who dedicates their brief lifespan to helping the least fortunate among us. Is that something you are born with, or what? You all sure can make the rest of us look like so many self-centered greedheads.

People of the world who suffer under authoritarian regimes. May this New Year bring the fall of all tyrants and despots.

Friends who laugh with me when I'm happy and comfort me when I'm sad. This world would be a much colder place without you.

Women I have held close. Even if things ended in a less than ideal way, you still took a part of me with you. May you forever be healthy, happy, and in loving arms.

Family members who won't be at the table for Christmas dinner. I still miss you very much but hope to delay joining you for as long as possible, if you don't mind. I am finally able to think of you and smile instead of always crying because I realized that is what you want me to do.

I would also like to extend warm greetings to everyone who reads the Opinion page, and especially to all those I offend with my columns. May we all keep on working to make life more interesting and remember - you must search for happiness but the pain will come by itself.

Hypocritical 'free speech'?

I'm writing in response to Elizabeth Rich's letter "Is This Freedom of Speech" in Monday's Collegian.

Rich starts off in reference to freedom of speech asking, "But what about when it offends a race of people?" I take it she also means any group or lifestyle that a person may choose to lead.

She is talking about "freedom of speech," and although I may not agree with all of Cliff Myer's jokes, he has every right to say anything he chooses to, even if he does offend some people.

Simply because you don't agree with his jokes doesn't give you the audacious right to condemn him. The radicals who speak in front of the Student Union sicken and offend a lot of people, but nobody questions their right to speak.

She then addresses a column written by her housemate Mark Caldeira, "Gotta Love Those Radicals" in the Collegian, Nov. 26. Although she did not agree with him, she commended him for trying to get his point across. In response to his column, two jerks called and made threatening remarks. In actuality, Mark Caldeira blatantly threatens and stereotypes practically the entire population of UMass simply because they are not like him.

In my liberal perspective I find Mark Caldeira as narrow-minded as Cliff Myer, by Rich's own definition of "offending a race of people." Thus Elizabeth Rich is a hypocrite for condemning Cliff Myer and commending Mark Caldeira for doing essentially the same thing.

Society can't afford protest

To the Editor:

We were appalled and outraged by yesterday's advertising a heterosexual protest, complete with the burning of an effigy, to counter today's Gay and Lesbian Awareness events. What has campus consciousness come to, when a group of students feels such unfounded fear and aggression against any civil minority group of this campus and anywhere else. This type of fear is simply counter-productive to promoting relations between all groups on campus whether they be the College Republicans, the Campus Crusade for Christ, or the People's Gay Alliance. Today's PGA events are planned in order to establish a congenial and supportive atmosphere for all people in the UMass community be they gay, lesbian, straight, or bisexual. It appears to us that today's counter-demonstration is planned in a most negative and heterosexist manner, the type of which our society can ill afford.

A thank you for making walking safer

Recently I decided to take advantage of the Student Escort Services which is provided by the Student Security Organization in the Department of Public Safety at UMass. I felt a little strange about calling for one simply because I've on occasion walked around the campus alone at night, and I've always thought, "What could possibly happen to me?"

But, why take a chance? All you have to do is call 545-2123 any time you are going to be out walking alone, and a cheerful, courteous person on the other end of the phone will gladly provide you with an escort so you can get to where you are going safely. I encourage everyone to use this service. It takes just a few seconds to call, and you will be glad you did. My thanks to the student security organization.

OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Rights are for everyone

The issue is human rights.

As long as lesbians and gays are being attacked and discriminated against in all facets of American society, including the University of Massachusetts, it is their right to be outspokenly against oppression, and it is the responsibility of anybody who is concerned about human rights to support their struggle for freedom.

Yesterday some people put signs up around campus which stated: "Heterosexuals fight back, protest Friday's 'hug a homosexual booth." It then urged people to join a march from Southwest to the Student Union Building and to hang in effigy a symbol of the gay and lesbian movement.

We condemn the actions of these people. The idea is hateful and fascistic. Perhaps these people are terrified of their own potential to be bi-sexual, or perhaps they feel that their sexuality is under attack, but whatever their motives are, the actions they have proposed are reprehensible.

The People's Gay Alliance planned the Gay and Lesbian Blue Jean Day to stress the lighter side of being gay and to help educate people about their heterosexism.

This way people could examine and perhaps question their own beliefs about gay and lesbian oppression as they got dressed in the morning and decided whether or not they wanted to wear blue jeans.

If people decided they had to break out their corduroys it was a chance for them to analyze why they did not support gay and lesbian rights and perhaps question society's "compulsory heterosexuality," as the poet Adrienne Rich put it.

The argument that "gays are okay, I just don't want to hear about it," is unfair. As long as gays and lesbians remain silent about the hetersexist harassment, hatred and violence that is perpetuated on the lives of homosexuals, little can be done to stop it.

Until everyone has full civil rights, no one is truly free.

A letter from the Editor

Rita Murphy

When I graduated from High School, a guidance counselor told me to hold on to my idealism for as long as I could because one day, he said, I would wake up and see the world, the whole world.

Four years later the world is a different place. My eyes are as bright as ever, but they are no longer seeking out everything in their path, they are now searching for hope and hoping that much of what is in their path disappears.

As the Editorial Page Editor of the Collegian, I probably read more letters in one day than most people write in a semester.

I read letters from people who say there are too many handicapped ramps in proportion to those who need them, so the ramps should be made into bike ramps.

I read letters from people who believe the way to prevent rape is to give "two percent of all the feminists in the world a handgun or better yet give two percent of the male population handguns to get rid of the feminists."

I read letters from people who believe there is a strong correlation between child abuse and equality for women.

I read letters from people who say they don't understand why Jewish students get upset because they have to attend classes on Rosh Hashanah while Christmas is a legal holiday.

I read letters from people who say affirmative action is discriminatory against whites.

I read letters from people who say homosexuals should "go back into the closet where they belong."

I read letters from people who say they are sick and tired of others complaining of racism and sexism "because everyone knows they don't exist anymore."

I read letters from people who have written letters to the Collegian and have since received repeated death threats and warned never to write another thing in the newspaper or face the consequences.

I read letters. I re-read letters. Sometimes I laugh at the letters sometimes I want to cry. I keep a folder on my desk, it's labeled 'socially obnoxious.' It started out empty, it grows every day. I see it with my eyes. I rub my eyes, I wish it away, but it stays, it grows.

Most people like getting letters. Sometimes I do too, sometimes I don't.

We are one and the same

Elizabeth Luciano

I'm heterosexual. I don't mind admitting it. I'm not afraid to hold hands with a man in public. I'm heterosexual, and I'm not worried that I'll lose someone's friendship if I tell them so.

But for some of my friends, being open about their sexual identities isn't so easy. They tell me it's hard to be gay in a world that reveres Barbie and Ken, and wedding cakes with a miniature bride and groom perched on the top. I believe it.

What a lot of well-meaning people don't realize about my homosexual friends is that their sexuality doesn't dominate their whole lives. Just because I'm heterosexual doesn't mean that I'm constantly thinking about my relationships with men. Other things are important too: coursework, friendships, finances. Homosexual people's lives are similarly balanced. Sexuality is an important facet of a person, but it is just that one facet.

A lot of heterosexual people worry about being approached by a gay person. A woman in one of my classes once said she'd like to have a relationship with me, and I told her that I was flattered, but comfortable with being straight. We're friends now.

I'm still amazed that she had the courage to raise the subject. I think about how difficult it was for me to ask a man that I liked if he wanted to study with me one evening. Mulitply that nervousness by nine, since one person in ten is gay. (Yes, three people on your dormitory hall could be homosexual.) That's a lot of nervousness, and a lot of courage.

Some straights worry that a gay person might try to push them into a relationship. They don't want to be "bulldozed" by a homosexual person. Well, I don't want to be bulldozed into a relationship by a heterosexual, either, and some heteros out there can be pretty damned pushy. I don't want to be overwhelmed by a woman -or a man. Nobody wants to feel as though they have no say in where a relationship is going.

At the risk of sounding corny, it can by a very cold world out there. And if someone finds somebody else who cares about them, and with whom they can express affection, and that person happens to be of the same sex...so what?

Elizabeth Luciano is a Collegian columnist.

Letters to the Editor

The policy is clear

The campus policy concerning discrimination is very clear. It prohibits discrimination on the basis of sexual preference.

This policy reflects our commitment to the protection of all the members of our community, and to the preservation of an environment in which all points of view may be expressed, even if those views are unpopular, without fear of retribution. Without such an environment, we forfeit our tradition of free inquiry and we jeopardize the distinctive nature of a great university.

Since the policy against discrimination is quite clear, I call upon all the members of the community to respect the diversity and spirit of tolerance which has characterized this campus for more than 120 years. The University administration takes its responsibilities in this area very seriously, and will take whatever steps are necessary to enforce the rights of all those who work and study on campus.

Richard O'Brien
Acting Chancellor

Don't bring our favorite clothes into things

We are writing in response to the advertisement placed in Tuesday's Collegian concerning gay awareness. It has been proposed that on Friday, December 7, any member of the UMass population wearing blue jeans is supporting the gay awareness movement. Well, we are aware of the fact that the sponsors of gay awareness have picked America's most popular article of clothing to prove one's support of their movement. We are also aware of the fact that a very large number of people will be wearing blue jeans whether they are or are not supporting their cause. Therefore we fail to understand the significance of their proposal. We also resent the fact that we must carefully decide what to wear for fear of adhering to somebody else's views.

Famine's political ramification discussed

By SANDRA DIAS
Collegian Correspondent

The underlying causes of Ethiopia's famine were discussed last night at the University of Massachusetts by Dan Connell of Grassroots International.

In his lecture to an audience of thirty people, he stressed the importance of active community awareness and participation in alleviating the situation.

Connell, executive director of the independent, non-profit, social change agency, emphasized that the famine is fundamentally political and that the drought is not wholly responsible.

"There is no escaping the fact that the famine is being used as a political weapon. It is a strategy to destroy the opposition by destroying the people," Connell said. "The area of Tigray and Eritrea have been the worst hit," he said.

This area is home to the military movement which opposes the Marxist-military government of Ethiopia. "This government controls the towns and cities while the opposition movement controls the countryside," Connell said.

Connell blamed the United States and the Soviet Union for aggravating the situation. "Ninety percent of U.S. aid goes through government held channels and never reaches the hard-hit areas of the north," Connell said. He added the "USSR could have seen the famine coming. They sent small amounts of rice which the people do not eat, and transport assistance such as helicopters and planes."

The Soviet Union, an ally to the Ethiopian government, flew the people out of the opposition areas in the north to the south according to Connell.

Connell asked that all Americans do their part in becoming involved in the assistance programs. "It is up to all U.S. citizens to figure out what's going on out there. Put pressure on the institution to tell more," he said.

Connell said that the press had neglected the Ethiopian famine situation because it wasn't newsworthy. The Ethiopian government had "succeeded in covering it up for quite some time," he said.

He said that feeding and relocating the people is not enough. He emphasized the importance of "reorganizing the society from the bottom up." Taking the people away from their farms would only displace them, he said. "We cannot come in from the West and impose any economic strategies," Connell said.

Americans must teach Ethiopians to graduate technologically in terms of tools and show them how to rotate crops instead of farming small crops. He added, "It is hard to do any large-scale work when you've got planes bombing."

Nicaraguans live for the revolution

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

In July, 1972, the clock on the cathedral in Managua, capital city of Nicaragua stopped at 12:30 after an earthquake which devastated the country. Today, Managua is still a big open field with a few buildings standing intact. The only building that has remained standing after the earthquake is the Bank of America.

This is what Jim Manwell, a University of Massachusetts professor in the mechanical engineering department and Walter Puleo, a Math grad student showed in a slide show to an audience of 20 people at the Campus Center last night.

She said Nicaraguans can distinguish between Americans as individuals and the American government. Puleo said they were interested in teaching her and other Americans there, so that they would "show the real truth of what's going on."

Every aspect of a Nicaraguans life is dedicated to the revolution, which is named after their leader Augusto Sandino.

Manwell and Puleo said that FSLN, the name of the revolution, are present all over the country, in support of the revolution which tries to reconstruct the country after the overthrow of Anastasio Somoza in 1979.

Nicaraguans are very concerned about the welfare of their children. Banners with slogans 'happiness of children is defending the revolution' are hung in different parts of the country, according to Manwell and Puleo.

Manwell said children are h appy and well-fed. "They sort like Americans despite the fact Americans are waging a war against them," he said.

Puleo said Nicaraguans are eager to talk to Americans because they would bring the realities of Nicaragua back to the states and "save them."

Puleo who went to Nicaragua to satisfy her curiosity said the country is "beautiful, exciting. The government is really interested in improving the conditions of the people."

Even the churches are sympathetic to the FSLN and the movement. Murals on a poor church in Ciudad Sandino shows how Christ worked just like the poor farmers. Their message is to struggle in this life, rather than in the next, the slides showed.

SOME HOW WE SURVIVE

Somehow we suvive
and tenderness, frustrated, does not wither.
Investigating searchlights rake our naked unprotected contours; over our heads the monolithic decalogue of facist prohibition glowers and teeters for a catastrophic fall:
boots club the peeling door.
But somehow we survive
severance, deprivation, loss
Patrols uncoil along the asphalt dark hissing their menace to our lives, most cruel, all our land is scarred with terror, rendered unlovely and unlovable;
sundered are we and all our passionate surrender
but somehow tenderness survives.

Red Sox should stop being cheap, don't let Rice go

Jerry deSimas

Boston is a town of great traditions. In the sporting world, one only has to gaze up into the rafters of the ancient Boston Garden to see the winning and proud tradition of the 15 time N.B.A. World Champion Celtics.

However, when it comes to the Red Sox and the Patriots, tradition takes a different turn. These are teams that have traded away quality ballplayers and done all they can to destroy themselves from within.

The Pats, pre-season AFC East favorites now almost mathematically eliminated from the playoffs, have set the example at dumping quality players. Just look at former All-Pro Leon Fray and Jim Plunkett and Mike Haynes of the Raiders. Miami's Dan Marino, man who broke the NFL TD season record (40), won't throw to Haynes side. He'll take his chances with Lester "Stickum" Hayes.

Instead of Haynes, the Patriots have to settle for a good but often-burned athlete in Ronny Lippett.

Now the Red Sox, in the continuing tradition of Hayward Sullivan (remember Fred Lynn and Carlton Fisk) have slugger Jim Rice on the trading block.

The Red Sox need Jim Rice and should pay what they have to so they can keep the man. Rice is the leader of the club and they can't afford to lose him. The club has the potential to do something next year.

The Sox do need pitching strength but by trading Rice, they will just weaken their offense and lose some tremendous leadership.

Patience and not such a tight-wad on the pocketbook will benefit the Red Sox. Boston doesn't deserve to be anyone else's farm club.

The Chicago Bears are really hurting and it showed in their signing of Greg Landry, cut by the Arizona Wrangler of the USFL after the season. The former UMass grad is just too slow and doesn't have the arm he used to with the Lions and Colts. He should retire, cash in on his endorsements and stop embarassing himself.

Hats off the University of New Hampshire hockey coach Charlie Holt for admitting that he made a mistake in playing an ineligible player (not enough credits) that resulted in the Wildcats forfeiting three of their four wins. UNH is now 1-15 overall, 0-13 in Hockey East.

Karate hosts New Englands

The University of Massachusetts karate club will be sponsoring the New England Collegiate Karate Tournament Championships Saturday Dec. 8 in the NOPE gym.

UMass is the defending New England champions and will face challenges from Boston University, Yale, Boston College, MIT, Lowell, Amherst College, Bridgewater State and UMass/Boston for the title.

The tournament will run from 10:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. and admission is free.

Events will include advanced and novice team sparring, advanced team karate and women's individual sparring.

Huskies outlast Minutemen, 64-52

UMass held scoreless for final 3:17 of game

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

STORRS, Conn. - The University of Connecticut broke open a four point game with 3:17 left with eight unanswered points to hand the University of Massachusetts its first loss of the season, 64-52, in Storrs last night.

UMass guard Carl Smith, with 3:17 to go, cut what had been a 10 point Huskie lead (56-46) with a short jumper, after a steal by Horace Neysmith. Smith's hoop cut the Huskies lead to four, 56-52.

But the Minutemen went cold for the remainder of the game, missing six shots from the floor and three foul shots to fall to 2-1 on the season.

For the Minutemen , Neysmith had 15 points, Smith had 12 and Donald Russell added 10 points. UConn point guard Earl Kelley had a game high 20 points with guard Alvin Frederick scoring 12 of his 16 points in the second half.

UConn took the lead early in the second half on two Frederick free throws and Ray Broxton jumper, 31-28. The Minutemen retook the lead with 15:19 remaining on a Russell hoop, 36-35. It was UMass' last lead of the night as the Huskies ran off five straight points.

UMass tied the game at 42-42 on a pair of Russell foul shots but a six point UCOnn run, sparked by a pair of Tim Coles baskets and a Kelley jumper put the Huskies ahead for good, 52-44.

"I'm proud of the way our players played. Our team is really playing as a team. I didn't think it was a 12 point ball game," UMass coach Ron Gerlufsen said.

In the first half, the Minutemen went out to a 28-27 lead, thanks to a tough defense and nine points from Neysmith and seven from Carter.

The Minutemen went ahead 4-2 on a pair of Neysmith hoops and forged an early 14-11 lead as Carter came in at small forward and hit a pair of short jumpers sandwiched around two Smith free throws.

The Huskies took the lead, 21-19, with 4:19 to go in the half as Broxton hit a jumper. The Minutemen battled back to take the lead with 1:10 remaining in the half as Neysmith drove into the lane, was fouled, and hit both free throws.

After a UConn miss, the Minutemen held for the last shot with 55 seconds to go. But Ron Young turned the ball over with 18 seconds left. Kelley was short on a jumper with one second remaining and UMass retained its slim lead.

UMass forward Tom Emerson was strong on defense, holding UConn forward Tim Coles scoreless in eight minutes of action.

On Saturday, the Minutemen will be at the Hartford Civic Center to face the University of Hartford at 7:30 p.m.

Cross bumps off women's hoop

Hebel leads in 56-49 loss

By JOHN A. NOLAN
Collegian Staff

Entering last night's game, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team had a good idea of the Holy Cross game plan. The Minutemen expected some intense defensive pressure and a lot of scoring from Crusader forward Janet Hourihan.

Unfortunately, game preparation cannot substitute for performance, and under the pressure and intensity that had been anticipated, UMass fell to Holy Cross 56-49, before 170 at Amherst College last night.

"We knew exactly what to expect," said UMass head coach Barbara Stevens. "But instead of reacting in a positive, controlled manner, we panicked."

UMass shot a cold 32 percent (20-61) from the floor and combined with 28 turnovers, the Minutemen were losers for the fourth time in five games. Barbara Hebel led the team with 12 points with Karen Fitzgerald adding nine. Jerrie Bernier and Tara Lewis added eight apiece. Karen Damminger (9.8 pts. per game) missed the game due to personal reasons.

The Minutemen bolted out to a quick 9-2 lead behind a pair of baskets by Hebel and a jumper by Bernier. Responding to the pressure, Holy Cross switched to a full court defensive press in order to take the tempo away from UMass.

The change produced immediate results as the Minutemen buckled beneath the Crusader's physical play. Holy Cross took advantage of several UMass turnovers enroute to an 16-3 explosion which saw Crusader forward Janet Hourihan score eight of her game-high 24 points.

UMass responded with a comeback of their own and cut the lead to 20-18 on a Bernier turnaround with 3:43 left in the first half. Then Hourihan took control and spurred the team to a 9-1 run as she hit for six of her team's final nine points in the half.

UMass came out in the second half trailing 29-19, but quickly found themselves in trouble as numerous turnovers were converted into Crusader points.

"Our game plan was to stop Hourihan in the second half," said Stevens. "But in concentrating on Hourihan, we were unable to make the adjustment when their guards got hot.

"Their pressure defense took its toll on us," said Stevens. "But we have to keep patient and learn to think a little bit more. The team wants to run. I guess it's like keeping kids on a leash. They want to do so well, but there is still a lot to learn."

On Saturday, the Minutemen travel to Washington, D.C. to face George Washington in the first Atlantic 10 game of the season for UMass in a 2 p.m. contest.

The Colonials fell to UMass last season 61-54, but managed a 14-14 season (2-6 in the conference).

UM gymnastic squads highlight home action

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

This weekend will see six University of Massachusetts teams swing into action with four teams playing for the last time before intersession.

Today, the women's gymnastics teams hosts the UMass Invitational at Boyden's Gymnastics Center at 7 p.m. Powerful New Hampshire is expected to win the event. Northeastern and UConn will also be on hand. UMass, under new coach Chuck Schiebler, is suffering from injuries but could take second.

Saturday will see both the men's and women's basketball teams on the road with the men at Hartford and the women opening up the Atlantic 10 conference schedule at George Washington.

The 2-0 men's gymnastics teams will host a tough Syracuse team at Boyden at 1 p.m. The UMass squad defeated Lowell on Wednesday and has looked impressive. Freshman Roberto Weil has been one of a crop of solid newcomers for coach Roy Johnson.

The men's track team will be at the Boston University relays competing against a host of schools. The wrestling team heads to Lowell for a meet against the host Chiefs, Southern powerhouse George Mason and the University of Maine.

On Sunday, the women's gymnastics team is at Yale and the 0-4 UMass women's swim team will host defending New England champion Maine at the Boyden pool at noon.

For the track, gymnastics and swimming teams it will be the last action until the intersession. All four teams will be off for about a month.

Although the counter march for the Gay and Lesbian Day activities was not originally part of the game plan, 100 strong came out to support awareness of homosexuals at the Whitmore Administration Building.

Anti-gay protesters have change of heart

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Staff

An overnight organizational effort by gay students and their supporters largely defused a planned rally in protest of "Gay and Lesbian Day" at the University of Massachusetts Friday.

A student who had earlier posted leaflets on campus Thursday urging that "HETEROSEXUALS FIGHT BACK" against a "Hug a Homosexual" booth with the hanging of a dummy "representing the Gay/Lesbian movement" said that talks with People's Gay Alliance President John Jablonski had convinced him that his actions were "oppressive."

This series of planning considerations, informal talks, and administrative meetings Thursday night combined to:

- organize a counter rally by gays and gay rights supporters,
- obtain security and observational measures by the University administration,
- inform the organizers of their responsibilities during their planned protest march and dummy hanging.

At 10 a.m. Friday, gays and supporters met outside the Blue Wall and marched to the Whitmore Administration Building to "individually confront" the anticipated protest march from the Southwest Residential Area.

Once at Whitmore, the counter rally grew to more than 100 people who listened to area gay representatives speak on gay issues and voice their opposition to the protest rally and dummy hanging.

"We're here to show our opposition to a group that wants to harass us," said Paul Throne, treasurer of the PGA.

Throne also told the crowd that they should "act on the highest principle of non-violence."

At 10:30 a.m., Richard Gatnik, who had originally organized the protest rally and dummy hanging, walked from the Southwest Residential Area with five other students.

Equal treatment for gays demanded

By IAN POLUMBAUM
Collegian Staff

Student gay rights advocates presented University of Massachusetts administrators Friday with a list of demands for improving the atmosphere for lesbians, bisexuals and gays on campus.

Members of the People's Gay Alliance addressed their demand to Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey and seven other UMass officials, asserting, "We hold the University administration responsible for not creating a campus environment that is truly one of civility for lesbian, bisexual, gay people and our heterosexual allies."

PGA President John Jablonski said the demands were partly in response to leaflets that appeared on campus Thursday urging that "heterosexuals fight back" against Gay and Lesbian Day activities Friday by hanging a homosexual in effigy outside the Student Union Building. The "hanging" never took place.

The demands called for the establishment of a professionally staffed office of lesbian, gay and bisexual concerns which would coordinate a media project, cultural and educational activities including a "heterosexism awareness week" and "provide sensitivity training" to University employees.

They also asked the administration to add material "relevant to the lives and experience of lesbian and gay people" to its curriculum and libraries.

Trey Williams, special assistant to Dennis Madson, vice chancellor for student affairs, said he met with PGA members Friday and told them he would urge Madson to bring the request for the new office to the Vice Chancellors' Executive Group Dec. 17.

"That (establishing the office) may take the greatest amount of work," Williams said. "We're talking about allocating money and space. That's an executive decision."

Referring to the demand to add library and course material, Williams said, "I think that would be wonderful. But that's way beyond this office."

Williams said many of the functions the proposed office would perform are already handled by student groups.

"The responsibility of keeping this in the forefront of everyone's mind is on them," he said. "I encouraged them to not stop being vocal."

"That's part of the problem," Jablonski said yesterday. "It's too bad that it has to be our responsibility."

"We'll do what we can to be vocal. But there are lots more gay people on this campus than the ones who are willing to be vocal."

David P. Carney, one of the PGA members who met with Williams, said he was pleased that the administration "said that everything we're asking for is really reasonable. They understands what we're up against and what we're doing."

"But there's a point when the administration needs to be able to take leadership if they're going to work to end discrimination," he added.

Local proprietors, patrons give final toast to happy hours

By NANCY A. BUKAR
Collegian Staff

A farewell to happy hours, effective today in Massachusetts, has bar and restaurant proprietors concerned with the possible loss of money and patrons seeing both benefits and detriments to the law.

Judie Terapulsky, owner of Judies and Barsie's in Amherst Center, said she will stress booking private parties, groups of people and taking reservations to make up for the possible revenue loss.

"We were very busy on Friday," she said. "Barsie's was jammed and Delano's had the longest line I've ever seen."

"The emphasis is back where I always wanted it to be, on the food," Terapulsky said.

Randy Krutzler, bar supervisor of the Top of the Campus said the restaurant will focus on weekly specials as opposed to daily specials to compensate the banning of happy hours.

"It was a little busy on Friday but pretty normal," he said. But "it won't affect our business too much if we market it right."

The ban on happy hours, signed into law by Gov. Michael S. Dukakis last month, is the first of its kind in the nation to reduce drunk driving. Among the prohibited are free drinks, special reduced prices, drinking contests, drinks as prizes and pitchers unless they are sold to two or more people.

Deb Swift, a waitress at Carbur's on Route 9 in Hadley who worked during Friday's happy hour said, "It was pretty slow because people thought they had another day (to drink). It was a real dead day, nothing great."

As for future plans, Swift said, "I think we're going to have to come up with something a little more competitive. I don't think anyone is real happy about it because that's where the money is."

Michelle Xenakis and Krista Gullbrand, UMass alumni enjoying Delano's final happy hour said, "We came to catch the last happy hour. This is a really sentimental place for us because it's our old hangout. It's a shame."

"I think it's the best thing they've done in the state so far. It's the best way to alleviate the alcohol problem in Massachusetts," John Blackwell, a 1984 UMass graduate said.

Susanne McFarlane, a waitress at Delano's said, "I think it's a good idea because with the two for one, you drink more than you want to and now you wont."

At the Timeout, the bar was empty and Brad Worthley, the manager said, "It was packed on Friday. There won't be any changes here. The prices will stay the same."

Hijackers surrender to Iranian troopers

(AP)—Iranian troops stormed a hijacked Kuwaiti jetliner at Tehran airport last night and the four sky pirates who had threatened to blow up the Airbus A-300 surrendered, the official Iranian news agency reported. It said the remaining seven hostages were freed unharmed.

The Islamic Republic News Agency, IRNA, said the hijackers and the hostages, including two Americans, walked down the landing steps of the Kuwait Airways jet with their hands raised.

It said the troops charged aboard the aircraft at 3:15 p.m. EST.

IRNA reported the operation began when the hijackers asked for service personnel to clean the plane, and Iranian soldiers were sent instead.

"When they arrived in disguise, they grabbed one of the hijackers and pushed him down the stairs," the news agency said. "The operation was carried out fast enough to prevent any counter action by the armed hijackers. Seconds later everyone inside came out, while bursts of gunfire were being heard all around the plane."

It did not elaborate about the gunfire.

The assault ended the hijacking that began last Tuesday when the plane carrying 161 passengers and crew was seized after making an intermediate stop in Dubai while en route from Kuwait to Karachi, Pakistan.

During the siege, the hijackers said they killed two Americans and two Kuwaitis, but also released most of the other hostages.

They had released seven hostages earlier last night at Mehrabad airport after saying they had wired the plane with explosives and issued a "last warning," IRNA reported.

It said the hijackers told the control tower they were saying their final prayers and would blow up the plane with everyone aboard if their demands were not met.

The hijackers sounded "more serious in their demand" for the release of 17 prisoners held in Kuwaiti jails, IRNA reported.

"The Kuwaiti authorities are killing time and this is our last warning," IRNA quoted one of the hijackers as telling the tower. It said they announced their "last will and testament," but did not say what was in it.

The hijackers then broke off radio contact, said IRNA, monitored in Nicosia, Cyprus.

SILENT NIGHT, HOLY NIGHT—Orchard Hill/Central residential area residents gather to ring in the holiday spirit with singing carols and lighting some of the area's trees.

WOMEN'S FORUM

The Women's forum is a weekly listing of events relating to women's issues. Notices should be sent to the Women's Issues editor, care of the Collegian, the Friday before the event.

MONDAY—The commitee for Equal Rights and Reproductive Freedom (CERRF) will hold a meeting at 5:30 p.m. to evaluate this semester and to make plans for the spring. Check the Campus Center schedule for room number.

The International Women's Event planning meeting will be at 4 p.m. in Campus Center room 917. New members wanted.

Dr. Fatou Sow will speak on Women and Development in Africa at 8 p.m. in the New York room of the Mary Woolley Student Center at Mount Holyoke College.

TUESDAY—The film "Marianne and Julianne" will be shown at 7 and 9 p.m. in Campus Center room 163. "Marianne and Julianne" is about two German sisters, both are political, one is a terrorist and the other works within the system.

WEDNESDAY—The Women's Admission and General Educational Support (WAGES) Program at Everywoman's Center will hold its final Brown-bag lunch from noon to 2 p.m. in the Campus Center room 805-809.

SUNDAY—The Women's Media Project, featuring all-women artists and news with a feminist perspective will air from 7 p.m. to 10 p.m. on FM 91.1, WMUA-Amherst.

The rape hotline is 545-0800.

The escort service number is 545-2123.

Activism and academics belong together

By TAARA EDEN HOFFMAN

NORTHAMPTON — Women must strengthen the relationship between academics and activism in the women's movement, according to two professors who spoke at Smith College Thursday night.

Arlyn Diamond, English professor at the University of Massachusetts, and Jean Grossholtz, political science professor at Mt. Holyoke College spoke at the Five College Women's Studies Seminar titled "Between Theory and Practice: Controversial Issues in the Feminist Academy, the Political community, and the Battered Women's Shelter Movement."

"(Theory and practice) aren't natural links. To do one well seems to require the repression of the other," Diamond said.

The academy has many rewards, including being surrounded by "people who speak a familiar language, people who agree on what should by important issues," Diamond said.

But feminists don't discuss enough "why women do what they do." Women must confront not each other's views, but each other's issues, for example, race, class, and heterosexual privilege. "From these follow the political realities in which we live," Diamond said.

Women today are in "in important places," Diamond said, and they are "overworked, exhausted, fragmented, and constantly embattled."

"I think we must create an entirely new academic enterprise to deal with sexism, racism, heterosexism, and all the other issues," Grossholtz said. She said the white, western world has "completely and totally ignored women," and that today's academy does not adequately confront this.

"Too much of our life is spent on understanding, getting the agreement of male academics, and trying to know white, western ideas," Grossholtz said. "Women have to create an entirely different reality than the one we live in."

Grossholtz discussed the difficulty in dealing with theoretical and practical issues within the battered women's shelter movement. The movement must be concerned with funding the shelters she said, "without redefining our purpose, our practice, our goals."

The battered women's shelter movement must be concerned with the batterer, an analysis of lesbian battering, homeless women, and sources of funding, while taking care of the women themselves, she said.

The number of shelters nationally and internaionally is increasing, Grossholtz said, and "we must think about the difference and similarities in our processes and our actions."

Craft fair shows off wares to passersby

By KENNETH B. ALBERT
Collegian Correspondent

The sights, sounds and smells of the holiday season filled the Campus Center concourse last week as part of a craft fair that resembled the familiar department store hubbub. Many students throughout the three day fair gathered around tables to shop or just browse.

Tables lining the walls of the concourse overflowed with a wide assortment of goods. Items sold ranged from coffee mugs, jewelry boxes, wooden flutes and scented candles to beeswax ornaments, hard-crafted jewelry and carrot cake. If the holiday gift giving list called for hand-made items, you could probably find it at the fair.

The Craft Fair was sponsored and organized by the Governor's Program Council and the University Craft Shop. Director Anna Dolan said, "The Craft Shop organized the fair. We solicited vendors, assigned tables, and got approval from the administration. GPC did the entertainment, and we did all the rest."

Dolan said, "There were 21 tables, about three quarters of which were student run." Most of the student-run tables represented individual talents, except for one booth where Earthfoods sold food.

"An artist at the fair might expect to make about $300 a day, or maybe as much as $400. The only requirement for acceptance to the fair was that the items had to be hand-made," Dolan said.

Dolan said the fair was good for the aspiring craftspeople here at UMass. "I think that, especially for students, they could get a lot of good ideas from the other artists," she said.

Fire alarm in Campus Center; few evacuate after warnings

A lit cigarette thrown into a trash receptacle in front of the Blue Wall Friday was quickly extinguished by Amherst firefighters who arrived at the scene at about 2 p.m., Fire Captain Herman Coulombe said.

Although an alarm sounded at 1:40 p.m. indicating that all persons leave the premises, patrons and vendors on the concourse, including those in the University store and students watching television in the Campus Center concourse continued their activities.

About 100 students remained standing in line at the check cashing center in the concourse basement although the windows closed and tellers told the students to leave the building.

Dudley Bridges, Campus Center Building Operations manager said everyone in the Campus Center should have been evacuated but that "there were more people inside than there were outside."

"It's against policy," he said, "but what can you do? They didn't know it was or wasn't a false alarm. It was kind of foolish."

"There were people breakdancing during the alarm and didn't leave, Bridges said. "People are aware but just don't care."

Arriving at Whitmore, Gatnik said after he and his floormates had met with Jablonski for three hours Thursday night, he realized that his actions were oppressive and hanging a dummy would be "in poor taste.

"I can't really see that what I was doing before was alright," Gatnik said. "What I was doing was oppressive."

Gatnik said he was surprised that Jablonski wanted to speak to him Thursday, but that their discussion had been "very educational."

"I'm a lot more open-minded now. People are people and whatever they want to do is okay," he said.

Yesterday, Jablonski said "I think he (Gatnik) was sincere when he apologized. When I was talking to him Thursday night, it was pretty clear that his mind was changing and that he was learning what gay people were really like."

From Whitmore, the combined group walked to the Student Union Building, where gay representatives and supporters addressed another crowd on gay issues at the University.

The "Hug a Homosexual" booth, an informational table, and an afternoon gay social went mostly undisturbed through Friday afternoon.

A Gay and Lesbian Dance Friday night, however, was interrupted when Campus Center security staff told those attending there had been a bomb threat.

Paul Throne said security guards appeared at the dance at 10 p.m. and asked those present to cooperate and leave the 10th floor function room where the dance was being held.

After a half-hour search, security guards said that the floor was clear and informed dance orgainzers they could return to the function room for the dance, which they did.

OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

Need for a commitment

Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey talks a good game about improving the status of women faculty at this University. But, he adds philosophically, "Until the hearts and minds of faculty change, not an awful lot of progress is going to be made." He might add, however, that no progress will be made until the hearts, the minds and the very bodies of the administration stop changing.

The commitment to affirmative action among the all-male cast that has been moving in and out of the seats of power in Whitmore with alarming rapidity, is as important in making progress as the individual votes of individual faculty members sitting isolated on individual departmental personnel committees.

Now that the music has stopped and Duffey is in the chair, he must take the opportunity to provide the consistent support and strong leadership previous efforts at affirmative action on this campus have so conspicuously lacked. In the absence of commitment and reinforcement from a high-ranking, visible source, everyone will continue to do as they pretty much please and, as usual, the struggle will fall into the hands of the oppressed groups who have better targets for their energies than these institutional battles.

If the administration were dedicated to the cause of women faculty they could, for a start, create a strong Office of Affirmative Action. The present affirmative action office is understaffed, inadequately funded and denied adequate resources. An office such as this, a telling measure of the administration's commitment, cannot possibly hope to monitor each department for compliance with its equal opportunity obligations.

If the administration were dedicated to the cause of women faculty, it could orchestrate a whole repertoire of measures to make the atmosphere of UMass one to which women will want to come and stay. It could improve current child care facilities, provide resources for feminist publications and activities, give greater merit for teaching and advising and broaden the traditional definitions of professional performance. By making this campus supremely attractive to women, the administration need no longer worry about what they call "the small pool of women candidates."

We believe that a diverse faculty ultimately leads to a more diverse, richer university for men and women alike. In denying responsibility for affirmative action, Duffey is limiting the number of possibilities available on campus. When Duffey says "it is a mistake on this campus to think this is the administration's problem," the mistake is all his own.

Looks like Santa has to be the one to bring equality to UMass, no one else will.

An Apple on every desk?

David Sachs

On Thursday and Friday last week, Tandy Corp. (Radio Shack) came to UMass. Tandy's purpose was to display its personal microcomputers (PCs) and offer a 20 percent discount on any purchase of their computers. This is a small (micro?) step in the right direction for UMass. Students and faculty at numbrous other schools have enjoyed the benefit of group discounts on PCs, saving thousands of dollars as a result. While I applaud the University for finally allowing computer retailers on campus, I feel that UMass is capable of playing a larger role in making PCs more readily accessible.

It is essential to make PCs available on this campus. Microcomputers are today what the pocket calculator was in the '70s. "Micros," however, will have a greater impact on higher education because of their easy use and wide range of applications. The focus of PCs is on using preprogrammed packages, such as financial analysis and word processing. However, anyone taking a computer course can see the advantage of writing a program on a microcomputer and sending the program via telephone (or coaxial cable) to the Cyber. No more waiting in line for a terminal, no more slow response time. Students owning personal computers have a computer available 24 hours a day. And educators claim that almost every college student will have a microcomputer on his or her desk by the year 2,000.

The problem with personal computers is that they cost approximately $2,000. This is beyond the reach of most UMass students. The University can play a critical role in making PCs available to students and faculty.

Today, freshmen at schools such as Dartmouth, Carnegie-Mellon, Clarkson, Drexel, and Union College are required to buy a microcomputer from their schools. These schools picked the specific PC that they felt met the students' needs best. Some schools surcharged students each semester to pay for the computers, which the students owned upon graduation. Others arranged credit. Officials at these schools are confident that their students will benefit greatly through owning and using a microcomputer, despite the initial high cost. So what is UMass waiting for?

The needs of a school as diverse as UMass cannot be served best by one microcomputer model. Also, I shudder to think of which model the school would choose (remember the dorm phones recently purchased?). Imagine the student protests at Whitmore if UMass attempted to raise tuition to pay for the students' PCs.

A better solution has been implemented at Stanford University and Rochester Institute of Technology, among others. The bookstores at each school carry several full lines of computers and accessories, and offer them to students at discounts of 40 to 80 percent. Other schools buy large volumes of computers from manufacturers, such as Apple and IBM, and receive discounts of approximately 1,000 dollars a piece, about half the retail price. One manufacturer (Apple Inc.) has such arrangements with 23 schools including Boston College, Brown, and Yale. Why not UMass?

Another way some schools make PCs available is by setting up "micro-labs." Students, instructed by their professors, learn commercially available programs that are necessary to their field of study. Computers are no longer used only by scientists in making complex calculations; they are as integral in theater set design as they are in making hotel reservations. Business students especially would be at a great advantage, as many industries are relying increasingly on electronic data bases.

I realize that the populous of this University has many other concerns, but the ultimate reason for attending school is to gain a superior education. By making PCs available at low cost, the University would be aiding both students and faculty. The Tandy Corp. has begun what will hopefully be the beginning of the PC revolution at UMass.

David Sachs is a UMass graduate student.

Just a few of the season's celebrations

As December rolls around again, we would like to take this opportunity to describe some of the festive cultural/religious holidays that are celebrated at this time of year.

Winter Solstice (December 21): In the Wheel of the year, the winter Solstice is the day when the sun's arc is the shortest. It is the time to look within and then to welcome the rebirth of the sun and the coming of the light. The Winter Solstice is an ancient agricultural holiday.

Hanukkah (December 19-26): Hanukkah literally means "Rededication of the Altar" and commemorates the successful revolt of the Maccabees in 167 B.C.E. who sought to maintain the Jewish people's right to live and practice as Jews. A Menorah (candlelabra) with eight candles is lit each night for eight nights, and gifts are exchanged.

Christmas (December 25): This is the Christian celebration of the birth of Christ, and is celebrated with the lighting of a Christmas tree and the exchange of gifts.

Kwanza (December 26-Janury 1): Kwanza is an African celebration of First Fruits. It is celebrated by lighting seven candles in a candlelabra called a Kinara. The seven candles represent the seven principles which are the foundation of African society.

Three Kings Day—Dia De Las Tres Reyes Magos (January 6): This is a Spanish holiday which celebrates the visit paid the baby Jesus by the three Magi Kings. The presents the Kings brought the newborn were gold, myrrh, and frankincense. The holiday is celebrated with the exchange of gifts.

These are only some of the holidays that fall at this time of year. Many of these celebrations are Festivals ofLights—decorations and activities can incorporate the themes of bringing light and fellowship. Sharing special foods and planning cultural activities can also bring people together. Although Christmas is the most visible of the holidays, it is important to remember that there are people from many different cultures on our campus. Let's do what we can this year to make this season a joyous one for all!

What do jeans, booth prove?

I would like to address the ad in Tuesday's Collegian concerning the "Gay Blue Jean Day" and "Hug a Homosexual" booth. What exactly are you people trying to prove with this "Hug a Homosexual" booth?

The gay rights movement has been completely discredited by purposely making a side show out of their cause. In order to be accepted in this society as a bona fide movement you should be seeking the respect of the people at this University and elsewhere. Instead, you insult their intelligence by subjecting them to your sexual habits. I for one never believed in public displays of affection of any kind. I thought it was respect and dignity that you wanted. I'm beginning to think it's something else.

Learning how to protest

I'm writing in response to the letter in Thursday's Collegian about the name of "Secret Santa" being discriminatory towards members of the dorm who weren't of Christian background. The name of the game "Secret Santa" has been a tradition here at UMass and the name didn't seem to bother anyone until the name "Minutemen" was voted sexist. Christmas is a Christian holiday, and Santa is a belief that goes back a long, long way.

Rumors have it that you changed your game name to "Secret Snowman," but God forbid (excuse the phrase), that is sexist. So then you agreed to the name "Secret Snowperson." Is everybody happy now? No. What if somebody in your dorm was from California? They don't have snow out there and maybe they've never seen snow or have made a snowperson before—well, I think we should just call the whole thing off.

You know, my dad was right when he said that kids go to college to learn how to protest. I'm beginning to believe him. Really, don't you have anything better to do than complain about little details?

One more comment: "You can please some of the people some of the time..." and I think you all know the rest.

The Weaker Vessel myth debunked

By LAURIE MILLER
Collegian Correspondent

The Weaker Vessel is the newly released book by British writer Antonia Fraser, who gained a reputation as a historical author with her biography of Mary Queen of Scots about 15 years ago.

In The Weaker Vessel, Fraser attempts to recreate the world of women in 17th century England. She researched the written record of women in the seventeenth century for twelve years before writing the book. Wherever possible letters and diaries of seventeenth century women were used; however, because of the widespread illiteracy among women of the period, much information is gathered from the reports of others.

"The weaker vessel" is a phrase which was used widely by 1600 to describe a woman, or womankind as a whole. The term was used in the King James bible, and also by Shakespeare. In this book, Fraser explains the basis for the concept of women as the weaker vessel; for example, because of financial dependency of 17th century women (except independently wealthy heiresses) upon men, social expectations and financial necessity influenced a young woman's marriage choice, because there was no active role for her to play.

Fraser then challenges the concept of women as the weaker vessel by illustrating the cases of women in powerful roles within the context of seventeenth century England. This includes the instances of women declaring religious freedom in newly Protestant England; such as catholic women defying the Protestant laws in order to reform disbanded convents to educate young women. Also women of the upper classes would often attempt to teach their female servants how to read.

The strength of the so-called weaker vessel is also illustrated by women in such roles as defenders of the castle (while husbands were away fighting England's civil war), fighting beside their husbands on the battle field, and acting as solicitors for husbands exiled to the continent after losing the civil war. And of course, most of these women, if they were wives, were able to perform these roles in addition to rapidly repeating pregnancies, childbirth, and the rearing of the one-third of their children who survived childbirth and early childhood.

The Weaker Vessel is a success. It is an historical book without a textbook feel, a book interesting enough to return to again and again to continue reading to the end. Sometimes it might seem as if the end is a long way off; the book is a serious work, and is almost 500 pages long. Although it is enjoyable reading, it is not light reading; you won't be able to read it on one Peter Pan bus ride.

The book was not meant to be a feminist work. Rather, it was meant to be a history of the life of women in the seventeenth century. Fraser does not feel that one has to be a woman in order to write about women. However, she feels that to write about women an author must have "a sense of justice and sympathy." With The Weaker Vessel Antonia Fraser shows that she is not only a just and sympathetic woman, but a serious historical researcher and the author of engrossing material as well.

FALLOUT SHELTER
This brooch is believed to have been hand crafted in Russia in the early 19th Century. Totalling almost 10 Carats, the jewels are old mine and Rose cut diamonds set in platinum.
Added to the brooch is a 17-inch strand of gem-quality pearls with a white-gold and pearl clasp. Anyone coming in contact with this brooch is immediately blessed with infinite wisdom and an acute sense of decorum.

Today's Weather

Oooh, a relief from winter with mild temperatures in the 50's and cloudy skies. Tonight, a chance of showers with lows in the mid 30's. Tomorrow, showers ending with gradual clearing. Highs in the 40's.

"Much of the Soviet firepower has been brought to bear on civilian targets including hospitals. As a result of the Soviets' scorched earth policy, the civilians and brave freedom fighters are suffering from starvation and malnutrition. It is unthinkable that we should turn our backs on these courageous people. Doctor Simon has not."

Cardinals stay in NFC hunt Patriots bow out, again

By The Associated Press —The St. Louis Cardinals, with a divisional showdown victory over the New York Giants, stayed alive in the four-team NFC East race, while the Pittsburgh Steelers and Cincinnati Bengals also won Sunday to keep the AFC Central a down-to-the-wire race as well.

Neil Lomax threw three touchdown passes and Ottis Anderson ran 12 yards in the fourth quarter for the tie-breaking score as the Cardinals beat the Giants 31-21. The results left both teams with 9-6 records.

In Pittsburgh, Gary Anderson kicked a 34-yard field goal with five seconds remaining, giving the Steelers a 23-20 victory over the Cleveland Browns and maintaining the Steelers' one-game lead over Cincinnati in the AFC Central division. Ken Anderson threw for 191 yards and two touchdowns to keep the Bengals' playoff hopes alive with a 24-21 victory over the New Orleans Saints.

The Philadelphia Eagles beat New England 27-17 to eliminate the Patriots from playoff contention in the AFC East and at the same time handed a wild-card berth to the defending Super Bowl champion Los Angeles Raiders. The Raiders play at Detroit in the Monday night game.

In a shocker, the Kansas City Chiefs swamped the Seattle Seahawks 34-7. Washington beat Dallas 30-28.

In other action, the AFC East champion Miami Dolphins defeated the Indianapolis Colts 35-17, the Green Bay Packers beat the Chicago Bears 20-14 and the Tampa Bay Bucaneers trimmed the Atlanta Falcons 23-6.

all-around, both advertised their pommel horse skills in their floor routines, adding much creativity. Lew Wingert and Jay Ronayne contributed to the 1.35 point lead over Syracuse following the first event.

On the pommel horse, Dougherty cleaned up with an impressive 9.3 taking first, with junior Mark Quevillon close behind with an 8.9.

UMass, now 3-0, maintained the lead after the still rings event thanks to Ronayne, Wingert, Weil, DeMarco, Dougherty, and Ciccone. Ciccone and DeMarco collected a 9.0 and 9.35 respectively to take first and third.

Vaulting came easily to the Minutemen, lead by Ronayne, who took a 9.2 and second place. Co-Captain Tony Sbarra received an 8.8 and third place. Wingert, Dougherty, DeMarco, and Weil scored well to help maintain the now 8.45 point lead.

Peter Lucchini, a talented gymnast who is now back in competition after suffering a knee injury nearly two years ago, lead the Minutemen with a smooth routine on the parallel bars. UMass led by 10.35 points after the event.

Sbarra brought the meet to a dynamite close with a double lay-out dismount off the highbar, which excited the fans again. He earned a 9.45 and first place. Joe DeMarco was right behind with an 8.85 to grab third, while Simon took second with a 9.25.

Hartford embarasses UMass, 63-59

Hawks win only 2nd Division 1 game in 32 years, UM now 2-2

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

HARTFORD, Conn. — The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team found out how valuable sophomore point guard Carl Smith is, the hard way.

With Smith unable to play effectively due to tendon damage in his right hand, the Minutemen handed the University of Hartford a 64-59 victory before 6,431 in the Hartford Civic Center Saturday night.

UMass, 2-2 after two straight losses, had a chance to tie the game with ten seconds left as sophomore guard Darryl Carter was at the line with a one-and-one with the Hawks ahead, 61-59. The 86 percent lifetime foul shooter missed before Hartford's John Hulbert rebounded, was fouled, and made both his shots for the final margin.

To blame the loss on Carter's miss would be unfair. The Minutemen were mason-like nine-of-22 from the line in the second half, they shot a poor 22 of 49 from the floor and were outrebounded 36-33 by a much less-talented Hawk team, that did capitalize with a 17-of-25 effort form the line.

In the first half, a period that UMass coach Ron Gerlufsen call the "most atrocious" one since he's been involved with the program, UMass fell behind 33-26 after a 10-of-26 shooting effort from the floor.

Smith, who damaged the tendons in his right hand in the Connecticut game on Thursday, played only two minutes in the first half, but with UMass trailing, started the second half and played for the remainder of the game.

Smith was 0-for-four from the floor and 0-for-two from the line marking the first time in his 33 game UMass career he failed to score a point. He couldn't control the ball with his right hand making it near impossible to shoot or pass.

"I don't know what to say. I did what I could," Smith said haltingly after the game. "The pain's there but I had to play."

Hartford, in its first season as a division 1 school, was playing before the largest crowd in its history and for thefirst time at the Hartford Civic Center. At 1-4, the Hawks had lost to Dartmouth, Rhode Island, Dowling and N.C. State before beating Maine.

"I think a lot of people on the team thought they could just show up to win, and we're not that good," Gerlufsen said. "This is the sickest feeling I've ever had after a game. We showed no pride, no heart and no composure."

In the first half, Hartford came away with a seven point lead thanks to its balanced scoring and UMass' terrible shooting.

With Smith sitting down after less than four minutes of action, reserve point guard Lorenzo Sutton and later Carter failed to get the ball into the low post and Minutemen forwards Horace Neysmith and Bobby Braun. Shooting guard Donald Russell (23 points) took up the slack with 11 first half points on three-of-five shooting.

Hartford's Ulysses Garcia and Mark Mitchell scored with points each in the half (they had 12 for the game) as the Hawks were 12-of-24 from the field and a good nine-of-11 from the line.

UMass opened the second half by allowing four unanswered points to fall behind 37-26 before making a valiant comeback.

With Russell and Braun, who pounded the boards, leading the way, UMass tied the game at 39 on a Russell lay-up after a great Neysmith feed.

UM went ahead at the 12:57 point on a Smith to Russell play before Hartford tied it.

Sutton put UMass up with a jumper, 43-41 and the Minutemen went ahead for the final time with 7:34 to go when Russell broke a 47-47 tie with a free throw.

After the Russell foul shot, the Minutemen bricked up its next five foul attempts as Hartford forged a 56-49 lead on a Mitchell drive with 2:59 remaining.

UMass forward Donald Russell goes up for a shot over Hartford's Mike Jones in action Saturday. UMass lost, 63-59 to the Hawks. Russell had 23 points.

Braun then fouled Garcia on a drive but the guard failed to convert the three-point play. Nevertheless, Hartford held a 58-49 edge with only 2:06 to go.

Employing a full-court press, UMass was able to cut the lead to 59-54 as Carter canned two free throws. Hartford then turned the ball over and fouled Braun with on 58 seconds left.

The forward made the first but missed the second, but Neysmith tipped the ball in to make it 59-57 Hartford.

Hulbert then hit four-out-of-five foul shots as UMass was forced to foul. His only miss came with 16 seconds left and set up Carter to drive down the right sideline before he was fouled.

With the crowd in his ear, the 6-5 swingman rattled his shot off the rim ending UMass' hopes.

UMass (59) Russell 7-9-23, Braun 4-2-10, Neysmith 4-1-9, Sutton 4-0-08, Carter 1-3-5, Young 2-0-4, Smith 0-0-0, Ramming 0-0-0, Emerson 0-0-0, Ryan 0-0-0. Totals 22-15-59.
Hartford (63) Garcia 4-4-12, Mitchell 4-4-12, Crawford 3-3-9, Hulbert 2-4-8, Tuomo 3-2-8, Gutierres 1-4-6, Jones 3-0-06, Powell 1-0-2. Totals 23-17-63.

Women now 1-5

Colonials take advantage, bury sloppy UMass, 75-59

By JOHN A. NOLAN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team turned in its second sloppy performance of the week as the Minutemen were buried by George Washington University, 75-59 Saturday.

In the first Atlantic 10 clash this season for UMass, the Minutemen aided the Colonials by turning the ball over 28 times and gave yet another poor shooting performance (37 percent) from the field. Add this to a shocking 26 team fouls and you've got the recipe for a runaway.

"We didnt come out with any kind of emotion," UMass head coach Barbara Stevens said. "I don't have any explanations as to why we started so poorly in the first half. We just couldn't do anything right."

UMass came out in the first half lacking defensive intensity as George Washington opened up an eight point lead early in the first half.

"The first half was almost embarrassing," said Stevens. "We let them (George Washington) do whatever they wanted on offense. It was by far our worst half this season."

The first half nightmare ended with UMass down, 43-23, a lead that the Colonials would never relinquish.

The Minutemen began the second half by running off six straight points while holding the Colonials scoreless for the first five minutes. However, after a Colonial time out, GW was able to break the UMass press and end Minutemen hopes of a comeback.

Playing without all A-10 sophomore forward Kas Allen, George Washington was led by freshman forward Cindy Baruch who led all scorers with 29 points and had a game high 13 rebounds.

UMass was led by Karen Fitzgerald (15 points in 12 minutes), Barbara Hebel with 14, and captain Jerrie Bernier who added 10. Susan Burtoft grabbed 10 rebounds.

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team set a new school record and remained undefeated, defeating Syracuse 263.3-251.5 Saturday at Boyden.

The meet began on floor exercise where UMass racked up the majority of its individual points. Junior Joe DeMarco who was second in the all-around, pulled off an impressive 9.4, throwing two clean double back tucks and a 1 3/4 front tuck. Senior Peter Lucchini also added a 1 3/4 to his routine receiving a 9.35. Lucchini said, "I'm out there to do what I've got to do, and it's damn fun!" The Politics Of Starvation

by Segun Eubanks
Nummo Staff

An article in the New York Times, in reference to starvation in Africa said, "Observers do not think people will die of hunger, they assume it as part of reality." Recently, drought and starvation in Africa and Ethiopia in particularhave been on the headlines of newspapers and television all over the country. The holiday season has brought out countless aid programs, flashing pictures of starving children and encouaging Americans to help these apparantly helpless people. However, there has been no analysis as to how the problem of famine developed or what needs to be done to assure that African nations can feed the population. These issues and the role the U.S. has in the development of Africa were discussed by a panel of distinguished educators in the presentation of "Aid to Africa" last Friday in the Campus Center.

The panelists included moderator Dovi Afesi, professor of African History in the UMass Afro-American studies department, Frank Holmquist, Professor at Hampshire College and Dr. Lansine Kaba from the Republic of Guines, professor of African History and Chairman of the Deaprtment of African and Afro-American studies at the Univesity of Minnesota.

"Famine is a political process," said Kaba, indicating that there have been many period of drought in African history in which famine did not follow.

Dr. Kaba said, the emphasis of U.S.-African relations should be what has not been done and what could be done. "Africa is not a continent cursed," said Kaba, pointing out that although there is a major crisis, Africa has made tremendous progress in the areas of social service. Dr. Kaba said the basic causes of the famine crisis in Africa stem from the impact of the competition between the super-powers. Threats, acts of violence, and the repressiveness of the newer African states. There is a crisis of leadership in Africa said Kaba, giving as an example the very high unemployment rates of University graduates throughout the continent.

U.S. aid to Africa started after World War II as a means to get rid of surplus food and set up industry. Government food assistance comes in three basic forms: aid or food given to programs for free, food sold on "good consetional terms" and emergency or disaster relief. According to Dr. Kaba the food sold to African nations create competition against local producers. The United States created a dependancy by supplying food for prices much lower than what is produced locally.

Kaba cited examples in which U.S. aid is politically motivated. Why does Isreal receive far more aid than the whole continent of Africa, Kaba asked, stressing that he was not Anti-Semetic. "Because there are political concerns involved," he said. Kaba also noted that the U.S. cut aid to Zimbabwe because President Mugabe did not authorize voting in favor of condemning the U.S.S.R. for shooting down the Korean Airlines plane.

Dr. Kaba then introduced his "agenda" for a major effort to improve the situation in Africa. The three points of the agenda are an improvement of the World Monetary system that would allow funds to be channeled more effectively, the need to reassess the conditions in which the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank make stipulations for loans which impose on African countries, and to extablish a new economic order whereby African commodities can get the prices deserved for their products. "What is needed," said Kaba, "is for the U.S. to assume its responsibility in the capitalist order.

A discussion period followed the presentation in which many important issues were brought out. In responding to a question raised by a member of the audience Dovi Afesi questioned whether the World Bank wants to prevent drought. The drought in Ethiopia was used to embarass the new government according to Afesi. "The Soviet Union has been more interested in selling guns to Ethiopia than food," said Afesi, pointing out that both super powers are using the drought for political gains.

The role of Black Americans in African-U.S. relations was also discussed. Kaba said Black Americans have played a major role in African politics but with the slight exception of the Carter administration they have had little influence on Capital Hill. Professor Davis from Amherst College, who was in the audience said the struggle of Black Americans made it possible African students to be at the University and mentioned the organization Transafrica as an example of influence in Washington. "The values of people must be changed," said Davis, "How will we get young people to go home [Africa] and do practical things and deal with realities?"

High School Students Visit UMass

by Christopher R. Allen, Sr.
Nummo Correspondent

About 29 students from the New Bedford High School in South Eastern Massachusetts visited the University of Massachusetts at Amherst on December 5 and 6.

The teachers responsible for organizing and chapperoning the trip are: Rhoda Purcell, Cynthia Conwood, and Cheryl Gibbs. According to Mrs. Purcell: "The visit was organized to give minority students information on the programs and opportunities at UMass." She said that the students participating in the visitation were all active members of the Minority Student Awareness Club at New Bedford High. The students arrived early Wednesday evening and were treated to a nice dinner at Yvonne John's restaurant in New Africa House. After dinner the students mixed and mingled with current students at UMass and then retired in their rooms in the Campus Center Hotel. On Thursday the students received advice on how to plan for college and also a brief overview of college life by some UMass students at the College Awareness Day sponsored by The Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students [CCEBMS] and the University Admissions office.

Solidarity Against South Africa Regime

by Rod Clare
Nummo Staff

The South African government has been under attack by Blacks in the past few weeks for its racist occupation of South Africa. This attack has not caused any blood to be shed however, nor has it been led by Blacks in South Africa. These protests have been non-violently conducted by Black Americans who are sick of America's encouragement of the South African regime.

The protests started on November 21 in Washington D.C. when three prominent Blacks staged a sit in at the South African embassy to dramatize the plight of South African Blacks and in particular the detention of 13 Black labor leaders.Randall Robinson, head of the lobbying group Transafrica; Mary Frances Berry, a member of the United States Commission on Civil Rights; and Walter Fauntroy, congressman from the District of Columbia; were those arrested by the D.C. police. After posting their own bonds, they went on to form the "Free South Africa Movement" that would extend the picketing around the country. Since then several Black congressmen along with other Black activists have been arrested in front of South African consulates in New York, Los Angeles, and Washington D.C.

Bishop Desmond Tutu has been fierce in his condemnation of the Reagan administration's policy of "constructive engagement," calling it "immoral, evil and totally un-Christian," and requesting a meeting with Reagan to discuss South Africa. They met in the White House Friday and although the meeting was cordial, both came away unswayedin their views. Reagan insisted that his policy of quiet diplomacy was benefiting Blacks while Bishop Tutu said that "the system of apartheid had worsened in the past few years."

Rev. Jesse Jackson has received a visa to visit South Africa next year but said that if the "Free South Africa Movement" asked him to stay he would not go. The demonstrations are receiving front page coverage in South Africa, showing that the regime is very sensitive to how it is perceived throughout the world, especially in the United States.

Reagan adminstration officials said, the protests will have no impact on its policy towards South Africa. One unidentified official in the White House said,"the leaders of the protest were not addressing issues of importance to Blacks." Considering the level of support given to the demonstrators around the country by Blacks, it shows that the Reagan administration is ignorant on what issues concern Blacks in both the domestic and foreign fields.

Unrest among South African Blacks against the government has been on the rise in recent months. The immediate causes for Black anger are said to be a combination of economic deprivation caused by a profound recession and a sense of political isolation due to the implantation of a new Constitution.

The Constitution offers a limited political voice to Indians and people of mixed descent but ignores the 23 million Blacks in South Africa and its nominally independent homelands. Rejection of this policy was shown in that only 20 percent of the eligible Indians and 30 percent of the eligible 'coloreds' bothered to vote members of their perspective groups into Parliament. On the very first day the new Constitution went into effect, rioting broke out in several Black townships protesting the fraudulent elections.

These actions have led to a wider protest of the apartheid system by students who refuse to attend school and by striking workers. The strike was particularly significant in that it had unusual support among ordinary workers and also brought in rival unions to protest against the apartheid system.

So far st least 160 people have been killed since early September, all except one Black, while several hundred have been injured. Raids by the South African police have also been conducted in numerous townships. The police have carried out house to house searches, the most alarming of which was in Sebokeng where the town's 120,000 residents found their town being swept by police looking for " criminal and revolutionary elements."

The strife now taking place in South Africa isn't due to totally political reasons. The government announced an increase in rent and electricity rates, enraging local residents who complain that they are already hard pressed. Many people have since refused to pay rents on the small, square homes that lie in the Black townships.

The Pretoria regime has taken an incresingly hard stance towards dissent with the arrest on last Friday of 2,300 Black workers, the biggest mass arrest in years. An equally disturbing situation is that the army has now lent support to the police in its township raids. The government has announced that regular army units will continue to play " a greater supporting role" in troubled areas. It remains to be seen how much more force the government will use against the increasingly strident demands of the South African people.

Ms. Carol Cresswell-Betsch owner of Global Gifts and Cresswell Gallery.

African Crafts Shop

by Christopher Williams
Nummo Correspondent

Finding a shop in the Amherst area where there is a relatively large selection of African and African-American crafts, jewelery, and posters to chose from was virtually impossible-that is before Ms. Carol Cresswell-Betsch arrived on the scene.

Ms. Cresswell-Betsch, who has two daughters that assist her, began her enterprise, now called Cresswell Gallery, in the upstairs office of a friend's store in Amherst. "I began in the upstairs office of a friend who had some space available. I used this office space for two years, until I moved downstairs in March of this year," said Cresswell.

Cresswell wishes that she could find a larger location for her merchandise in the Amherst area, but so far this wish has only been partially granted. Recently, she has opened a larger store in the Hampshire Mall in Hadley called Global Crafts. However, this is only on a temporary basis, because she will have to vacate the building by December 31 of this year. "I would like to find a store this large in Amherst, but right now its not available," stated Cresswell.

Even though Cresswell's store in the Hampshire Mall is only temporary, she does have Cresswell Galleries, located on N. Pleasant St. in Amherst. Cresswell Galleries is much smaller than Global Crafts, but nevertheless Ms. Cresswell uses the limited amount of space creatively.

When she was asked why she had opened the gallery which has been in existence for four years, she replied, "I wanted to try something different. I was a graduate student at UMass and after I had earned my Ph.D. in education, I found it difficult to find employment in the valley, so I created my own employment."

Cresswell then said, she has learned a lot from this experience. "There are a lot of things that you have to learn, and I learned the hard way. I did this because I liked it, I do not have a business background, my field is education," said Cresswell.

Furthermore, she added that she has learnt that Africans and African-Americans share many things with other people of color. "There are somethings that you see that carry between cultures. There are many similarities between people of color," stated Cresswell.

Cresswell's gallery and her temporary shop in the Hampshire Mall are worth visiting. There are many crafts, jewelery, and beautiful prints from Senegal, Kenya, Nigeragua, Ghana, and Botswana just to name a few.

In concluding Cresswell has this to say about the economic difficulties of a small business: "It's a wonderful idea to go into business for yourself, but there are some problems that one has to encounter as a small business, like competition. If I don't make my sales I have no sponsers who can bail me out. To make money you have to spend money. A lot of things were revelations to me, like the tastes and expectations of people, and the economy. People would want to purchase, but due to the economy it's just not possible," said Cresswell.

Rastas want Peace

by Rod Clare
Nummo Staff

Ras Leonard, a Jamaican Rastafarian poet now living in Brooklyn, gave a speech on what the Rasta movement stands for last Tuesday at Hampshire College. He laid a background on how the Rasta movement began and then explained the Rastafarian view on life today.

Ras Leonard said that the impetuous for Rastafarianism started in slavery with the struggle of Black people who were robbed of their past. In 1927 Marcus Garvey was deported from America to Jamaica. After arriving he said to his followersto look to Ethiopia for there a new king shall be crowned who shall deliver the Black race. In 1930 a new king was in fact crowned and his name was Haile Selassie I and his title was "King of Kings, Lord of Lords, Conquering Lion of the Tribe of Judah."

This was front page news in Jamaica and some people began to check their Bible to see if this was the person Garvey prophesized to save the Black race. When they checked Revelations and saw that someone adressed as the "King of Kings, Lord of Lords, Conquering Lion of the Tribe of Judah" opened the book with seven seals, it was figured that Garvey was right and in 1930 the Rasta movement was born. Ras Leonard noted that the Rasta movement was "a climaxation of Garvey's teaching."

He said that Rastas, "being forcefully uprooted from their homeland had to be the new pioneers in the search for world peace." Leonard identified Babylon as "the wicked system of exploitation" in the world and not just meaning the United States. The Rastafarian movement's main goal as he saw it is world peace and that "until Babylon the great has fallen, there is no peace."

Rastas in his view are only seen as Black nationalists when in fact what they truly represent is "the inspired word of peace and love." He said that when he found Rastafarianism, he actually found himself and that it taught him love. In closing he that principles and ethics, including respect for your elders, are the greatest things that you can teach your children.

Carlos Caban next to "Between Two Worlds" one of his artworks presently on display at the Augusta Savage Gallery through December 14.

The Augusta Savage Gallery located in the New Africa House at the University of Massachusetts/Amherst is featuring the art work of Juan M. Caban.

Almost one hundred people attended the formal opening of the exhibit on Friday December 7.

Caban was born and raised in New York City of Puerto Rican parents, "I have always been exposed to two rich and contrasting cultures," he said. His art symbolizes these contrasts while exposing you to the beauty and ugliness of life in a city. Caban's work is extremely diversified. There are art works portraying bar scenes, Christmas joy, city, country and island living. The piece that drew the most response is entitiled "Between Two Worlds," which protrays a grandmother in a rocking chair with an altar on her dresser and city life outside her window. Caban's style of work demands that you stop in front of a piece to study it. He places hidden scenes and messages within his work. "I like to use symbols such as a grandmother, snakes, etc. The subconscious tells a deep story when symbols are used." Caban went on to say, "in telling my story I reflect to others their story."

Caban is a pioneer in the art field by being the first to use wood and pencils along with burning and tempra, instead of the traditional materials. "The wood and pencil are a very nice marriage," he said.

Also at the Gallery are Christmas cards in Spanish designed by Caban, that are on sale to the public.

The exhibit will run through December 14. Anyone who has not visited the gallery is encouraged to do so. This artists' work is not just something you admire, he invites you through his work to experience it!

If you have never been to prison, The New World Theater Ensemble provided an excellent opportunity to see and feel its effects last weekend at Hampden Theater at the University of Massachusetts/Amherst with the presentation of an original production of Miguel Pinero's "Short Eyes."

"Short Eyes" is a drama about the realities of prison life. The scene is set in the day room of a New York jailhouse. When a young white man accused of child molesting is placed in the day room the plot develops into a shocking scenerio. Clark Davis, the man accused of child-molestation is beaten and harrased by the other prisoners, but finds a friend and confidant in Juan [played by Edwin Cancel], and reveals that he has a history of child molestation.

The play comes to a climax when some of the prisoners decide to rape Clark Davis. When Davis threatens to tell the captain, the prisoners panic and kill him, only to find out later that he was innocent of the crime.

"Short Eyes" is a prison slang for child molester and although the play revolves around that issue it brings out many other prison realities such as sexual relationships, racial relations and religion.

Miguel Pinero's writing was excellent but it was the great work of the actors that made the production both enjoyable and educational. Louis Alfred (who plays "Ice") and Jay DiPucchio (Clark Daris, which was later by Colin Wood) had excellent monologues. Markos Deoliveira (plays Paco) also had an excellent performance.

The realities of prison life are very harsh ones for all people. Black, White or Puerto Rican. And the New World Theater ensemble mesmerized and educated the audiences with an outstanding performance.

Sarah Vaughan, one of musical history's most gifted singers,performed at the University of Massachusetts/Amherst fine Arts Center, Saturday December 1,1984. Vaughan recieved a round of applause as she came in stage. Much to the audience's delight she began the evening's performance with "Fasicating Rhythm".

Over forty-four years of singing have proveded her with many opportunities to accompany and be accompanied by musical greats such as Billy Eckstine, Dizzy Gillespie, Fats Navarro and Charlie Parker just to name a few. She has also been a member of the Earl "Fatha" Hines band, with which she began her career at the age of sixteen, and moved to perform with the John Kirby Combo before beggining her own trio. In her performance here at the University the Sarah Vaughan Trio consisted of George Gaffney on piano; Andrew Simkins on bass; and Harold Jones on drums.Jones deilghted the audience with his solo during "East O' the Sun".

Vaughan, while singing added her own versions of lyrics to the songs. Throughout the performance she stopped to speak to the audience. In doing so she developed an atmosphere in which the diversified audience was at ease.

Vaughan had planned to end the evenging's performance with Cole Porter's "From This Moment On",the audience provided a standing ovation that didn't stop until she came out once again.

She asked the audience for their favorites and finally chose "Send In The Clowns" as an encore.

Vaughan a genius in her own field gave the audience a night a memoreos which were sweet and are sure to be treasured.

Letter To The Editor

To the Editor:

A misunderstanding has seemed to develop between the Student Government Assoication [SGA] Budgets Committee and the editors of the Nummo News. In your editorial ["Funding in Jeopardy", December 3, 1984], you have mistaken opinions and interpretations for facts. I would like to take the time now to set the record straight and hopefully heal some wounds on both sides.

For the fiscal year 1986, the SGA is staring at a mandatory budget decrease of approximately $120,000.00 due to full-costing. This is quite a major dilemmna that I am sure no one would ever want to face. The maker of the motion [not to fund Fine and Performing Arts Groups] and myself thought that it would be in the best interest of every Recognized Student Organization [RSO] if we explored which groups could be cut the most and still survive. Arts groups happen to have a trust fund set up specifically for them [the UMASS Arts Council supervises this trust fund] and in the past, many RSOs have combined this source of funding with the Student Activities Trust Fund [SATF]. This is all well and good, however, because of the mandatory cut in expenditures by the SGA, many RSO budgets may be cut-some drastically. The maker of the motion and myself believe that in order to save some RSO's budgets [including Third World groups] we would require Fine and Performing Arts groups to use the trust fund set up explicitly for them-the UMASS Arts Council.

The charge, made in your editorial, that this motion-and in effect the makers-is racist is insulting, reckless, inexcusable, heinous, unjustifiable, slanderous, and indefensible. Third World organizations were not the sole "victims" of this motion. The RSOs that the Budget Committee interpreted as being affectd by the motion were: New World Theater, Uhuru, Chamber Choir, The Blues Band, "SPECTRUM," and "DRUM." It is apparent that not all of these groups are Third World organizations, and furthermore, it should not matter whether they are or not-all RSOs should be treated equally. The Budgets Committee acted in a sensible way and passed the motion-a Third World Caucus senator even voted in favor of it.

It is easily seen that racism played no role in the motion, nor was it the intention of the motion. Therefore, I call upon the Nummo News to apologize to the SGA, the Budgets Committee, the maker of the motion, to all those who "voted in favor of it," and myself.

JORDAN A. ROSNER

EDITOR'S NOTE: The author of the editorial reffered to above requested NUMMO to withhold their name. Whether or not the editors of NUMMO agree with the author is, in this case, not the issue. We apologize for not making it clear that this was not a statement from NUMMO, but one person's opinion, however, we do not find any reason to apologize for the content of the editorial.

DISCUSSING THE X

by Rod Clare
Nummo Staff

"Most white students in the Southwest area government think that the Malcolm X Center is supposed to teach about Malcolm X," said Anthony "Husky" Robinson, co-coordinator of the Malcolm X Center, in an interview with Nummo News. The Malcolm X Center was formed in 1968 to provide a place where Third World students can come together and enjoy each others company while at the same time participating in workshops, guest lectures, and a Black film series.

In reference to the Southwest area government Husky said, "the Malcolm X Center has had a history of problems dealing with the administration." Defining the root of the problem, Husky said, that he felt that the administration is trying to take control of the Malcolm X Center and run it the way they want to. Questioned as to whether he though the administration understood what the Malcolm X Center meant, he responded, "I don't expect them to understand about the center because it doesn't serve them any purpose."

Now that there's a new Southwest area government, he was asked if he thought they would respond to the Center's needs, to which he replied, "I really don't know. There's been a few steps to better relations with the Southwest area's new co-presidents, Bill Collins and Laura Goldstrich. They seem to understand and are willing to work on bettering relations between the Center and the government, but that is yet to be seen!

Describing the importance of the Center, Husky noted, "First of all, it's an educational, cultural, and social center that caters to the needs of the Third World community in the University." We are the largest Third World center on campus and, along with the other organizations and centers, are only some of the places that cater to the needs of the Third World community in the Pioneer Valley.

Citing the support his staff has given him, he said, all have been very helpful but gave a special thanks to his co-coordinator Cassandra Edwards about whom he said, "She's the backbone to the Malcolm X Center." Pledging to continue trying to work-out the Center's problems with the administration he made sure to stress that the Malcolm X Center "will continue to be the same "X" we were in the past."

According to Paul Barrows, Director of CCEBMS an average of 200 students are accepted annually into the University through this program. Bernedette, a senior at New Bedford High said, "I love it here but this campus is big." Robert Woodbery, another senior, said he heard it was a good school; therefore, he decided to check it out. "Wow this place is big; but, I heard the teaching is good" said Daryn Gomes, another New Bedford senior when asked about his reaction to the University.

Mr. Barrows said he is grateful to the UMass Cape Verdean Student Alliance for their tremendous help towards the College Awareness program. All of the teachers thanked Rudy Jones, Assistant Director for Admissions, and Paul Barrows, Director of CCEBMS, for hosting the visit which they felt was successful. They emphasized that they hoped that this was only the beginning of an annual collaboration between UMass and New Bedford High School.

Regents revise statewide tuition increase policy

By ANNE McCRORY
and JOHN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

The Board of Regents of Higher Education, meeting in the Campus Center, yesterday amended its tuition policy governing the state's 29 public colleges and universities to include specific factors to be considered before a tuition increase is proposed.

The tuition policy, passed last March, puts a cap on the student share of tuition at 33 percent of the cost of education. The revisions emphasize that the 33 percent level is a ceiling that is necessary to prevent "substantially increasing the student share of cost in the event of dramatice decreases in state appropriations" in the future, the policy reads.

Regents Chairman David R. Beaubien said the revisions adopted yesterday "certainly clarify a lot of issues that were obviously confusing people before." He said the revisions emphasize that the 33 percent rule is a ceiling, not a goal.

The state Legislature in July rejected the Regents' proposed 15 percent tuition increase, the first step in instituting the tuition policy, after Gov. Michael S. Dukakis and some legislators and education officials stated their opposition to the Regents' policy. The governor and University of Massachusetts President David C. Knapp opposed the tuition policy because there was no rationale for the 33 percent level, and because higher tuition could block access for low income students.

Massachusetts resident students at UMass now pay $1,208 a year in tuition. That covers 24 percent of the cost of education, according to Arthur Jackson, Director of Financial Aid Services at UMass.

Knapp, in opposing the policy, has said it "ignores...the availability of student financial aid from state, federal and private sources," among other problems.

A tuition increase would now be dependent upon the regents consideration of unranked factors, including the mission of the institution, the availability of financial aid, the amount of public funding appropriated, the higher education needs of the Commonwealth, actual prevailing cost within public higher education, other vital considerations that might dictate a lesser or greater percentage and students' ability to pay.

Ability to pay will now be assessed using an income index whenever a tuition increase is considered, according to the policy. An income index would be based on state figures on personal income or disposable income, rather than on a price index, which is computed from national data.

The revisions came at the Regents' regular meeting, which followed their third annual higher education seminar in the Campus Center. The program included presentations on financial aid, affirmative action and fundraising.

The meeting at one point adjourned to executive session, where Chancellor of Higher Education John B. Duff signed the contract for the 1,500 faculty at the state's 15 community colleges.

Also at the meeting, the regents appointed Paul Marks vice chairman for the board, a position left vacant since David R. Beaubien was promoted to Chairman last summer. The regents also passed a motion approving a joint petition by Bridgewater State College and Southeastern Massachusetts University to award the degree of master of arts in psychology.

Medical troubles in Afghanistan

American doctor speaks on struggle in Asian country

By JIM AVERILL
Collegian Staff

Afghanistan has virtually no health care since the major relief organizations including the International Red Cross, the World Health Organization, and the U.N. relief organizations were ordered to leave after the Soviet invasion in 1979, Dr. Robert Simon, the first American doctor to enter the country since 1979 said.

Simon spoke before 50 people last night in the Commonwealth room. The speech was sponsored by the Thomas Jefferson society.

"The medical situation has been desperate since the invasion on Dec. 27, 1979," Simon said in a lecture on the current medical crisis in the country.

Almost all doctors and health personnel have been killed or driven from the country according to a survey by Dr. Abdullah Osman of Kabul University, Simon said. In addition, all hospitals and health care facilities have been bombed out or burned by Soviet troops. "To be wounded is to die in Afghanistan," Simon said.

Because none of the existing medical organizations were able to go into Afghanistan, Dr. Simon founded the International Medical Corps (IMC) in 1982.

The Corps will go into any situation in which there is desperate medical need. All members are unpaid volunteer doctors and nurses who work on a rotational basis. Their goal is to help the Afghans by training them to diagnose and treat diseases and war related injuries.

The IMC's medics must be prepared to deal with many atrocious injuries. According to Dr. Simon, most are caused by shrapnel from missles and bombs. Most of the injuries to children come from Soviet anti-personnel bombs which blow up when handled. They are meant to demoralize the Afghans by terrorizing them and inducing them to give up.

The Soviets have had to resort to these types of terrorist tactics because "the Afghans are the most courageous and rugged people I have ever encountered in my life," Simon said. The Mujahideen, Afghan freedom fighters have been able to retain control of 85 percent of the country despite the fact that one out of three Afghans is in a refugee camp. Dr. Simon said that if Afghanistan wasn't given more aid the Afgans would lose their war within two years.

Conduct code revision postponed until spring

By IAN POLUMBAUM
Collegian Staff

Student leaders expect to meet with administrators during intersession to write a final draft of the revised Code of Student Conduct, according to Student Government Association co-President Rick Patrick.

Last month, Associate Dean of Students Robert N. Brooks said, "We hope to have a mutually approved draft by Dec. 22."

"Neither the SGA not the administration see any dire need to get this document done before the end of the semester," Patrick said Sunday. "I really don't see any great rush."

Patrick said he hoped to put the revised code on the University Board of Trustees agenda by the end of next semester.

"We've been communicating with the Dean of Students office every week," he said, adding that he expected SGA Clerk of Courts Mitchell Roye to meet with Brooks or Dean of Students William F. Field yesterday.

But Field and Brooks said they had not yet met with students to discuss the code. Field and Brooks and SGA leaders drafted separate proposed revisions during last spring and summer.

"We are waiting for them (the SGA) to get together so that we can take the next step," Field said yesterday.

Students leaders have said they disagree with two major revisions sought by the administration; to abolish the practice of allowing lawyers to represent students before University disciplinary boards, and to provide for "interim action" whereby the dean of students can suspend a student without a hearing if the student is deemed a threat to the community.

The code has not been updated since it was written by Field and a group of students more than 25 years ago. New rules already agreed upon will punish acts of harassment based on race, religion, sex and sexual preference. The new code will also prohibit accessing computer files to tamper with records or invade another person's privacy, and will have stricter and more detailed rules on misuse of UMass ID cards.

Study shows 500-600 wild bears live in western Mass.

By TOM MIDDLETON
Collegian Staff

Between 500 and 600 Black bears roam the area west of the Connecticut River in Massachusetts, according to a six-year study being conducted by UMass researchers.

The study is being conducted to find out how many bears inhabit the state and how fast they are reproducing. The study is in its fourth year.

Thirty bears have been equipped with radio transmitters and their movements were followed "intensively." For four years, researchers from the UMass College of Food and Natural Resources recorded the animals' social interaction and which habitats they favored.

According to Ken Elowe, a graduate student in the College of Food and Natural Resources, female bears need 15 to 20 square miles to roam while males need 100 to 200 square miles to roam.

Elowe said that he was surprised by some of the results of the study. "I didn't think there were so many bears," he said. He said he was also surprised by the large area that male bears need to roam. Another surprise, Elowe said, is the fact that bears are not nocturnal animals. "They move almost none at night," he said.

The study is also focusing on population growth among Massachusetts bears. "We think the poulation is expanding slowly," Elowe said. "Bears only breed every other year so there is only half of the reproductive potential of other animals."

"What we assume to be pregnant females are followed intensively," he said. The nutrition of the mother as it affects cub production is recorded, he said. They compare food supply eaten in an area with the number of cubs born.

In January and February, the researchers go into the dens of hibernating bears to change the radio transmitters and count the number of cubs.

Elowe said every year there are some complaints of bears eating farmers' crops of killing livestock. "If the fall food supply is bad then bears tend to be opportunists," he said. "They will go into cornfields or they may take unprotected livestock."

"This year has been good," he said, "but it happens to a small extent every year." Usually, the damage is done in the towns of Ashfield, Goshen, Chesterfield, Williamsburg and Cummigton, Elowe said.

The study is being funded by the Massachusetts Division of Fisheries and Wildlife and the federal government matches 75 percent of the state's funds. The federal grant is paid for by an excise tax on hunting equipment.

UMass jazz group performs tonight

The University of Massachusetts Chapel Jazz Ensemble, directed by David Sporny, will perform tonight at 8:00 in Bowker Auditorium in Stockbridge Hall. Spanning a broad range of styles, the program will feature vintage Basie music, selections by Thad Jones, a 12 tone composition in the jazz tradition by Gregg Hopkins, and arrangements by Sporny.

Prior to joining the music faculty at the University, Sporny started the jazz program at Interlochen Arts Academy, where he formed the nationally recognized Studio Orchestra and his own band. He has been chosen to conduct the Western District Jazz Ensemble, sponsored by the Massachusetts Music Educators Association, as well as an all-star jazz band from western Pennsylvania.

The concert is free of charge by the Department of Music and Dance and is open to the public.

Women's caucus reborn, strives to promote involvement

By JEANETTE DeFORGE
Collegian Staff

"A lot of women are afraid of the caucus. There is a preconceived notion that a women's group is a left-wing lesbian organization."
— Marjorie Boone

The women's caucus of the Student Government Association has been revived after folding last semester due to lack of participation.

Of the 112 senators in the Undergraduate Student Senate, 38 are women. The caucus has been reactivated to give the women the support they lacked last year, said women's caucus co-presidents Melinda Thomas and Majorie Boone.

"The basic purpose of the Women's Caucus is a support group," Thomas said. "We have gotten a lot of good ideas (about the SGA) that wouldn't have come out if men (attended the caucus meetings)," Boone said.

There should be a 50-50 percent ratio of involvement between men and women in the senate, but there isn't, Boone said.

"Men tend to dominate the conversation (at the senate meetings) and (only) one or two women end up speaking out all the time," she said.

"Women are taught not to speak their opinions because it is not feminine," Thomas said.

There are currently 10 women in the caucus. Women haven't had the time to attend meetings because of exams, Boone said.

Since all senators are required to belong to a committee, Thomas said, she hopes the caucus will become a committee. Women senators will then have more time to get involved in women's affairs, she said.

"A lot of women are afraid of the caucus," Boone said. "There is a pre-conceived notion that a women's group is a left-wing lesbian organization." She said this notion is false. Political differences are put aside and the women concentrate on giving each other support.

The caucus often works in conjunction with the Women's Leadership Project and the Everywoman's Center, Boone said. The caucus will be holding an assertiveness training workshop and will be working with the rape task force, she said.

"We will be working on outreach when elections come about next year and we will try to get women involved (in the SGA). This (involvement) is desperatly needed," Boone said.

The caucus is sending surveys to other colleges, asking about women's groups and their student senates. "We would like to open the lines of communication with other schools," Thomas said.

Woman threatens to kill self, recieves treatment

Police responded to a University Park Avenue resident who threatened to commit suicide around 3 p.m. on Saturday, police said. The 22-year-old woman was brought to Emrgency Services for help.

A 22-year-old Waltham resident was arrested on North Pleasant Street Saturday night and charged with driving under the influence of alcohol, crossing a red light, and going the wrong way on a one way street.

A 27-year-old Amherst man was arrested on East Pleasant Street for operating without a license and failing to stay within marked lanes Friday night.

A 26-year-old Hadley man was arrested at 1:04 Monday morning on South Pleasant Street for driving under the influence of alchoho.

A 1983 Camaro was reported stolen from the Brittany Manor parking lot Saturday morning, police said. The car was estimated to be worth $7,000.

A Townhouse Apartments security officer observed a person kicking the door of a parked car in the parking lot Saturday night. The vandal's license number was recorded and traced to a Pufton resident, police said.

No estimate was made of damages to the vehicle.

A 36-inch Christmas wreath valued at $50 was stolen from the door of Silverscape Design jewelry store in Amherst Saturday night, police said.

The management at Plumbley's on Boltwood Walk reported a 19-year-old woman using a false ID that did not belong to her Friday night, police said. The suspect has asked for a show-cause hearing.

Police charge student with drug possession

A 20-year-old University of Massachusetts student was arrested at 8:50 p.m. Sunday in the men's bathroom in the Student Union and charged with possession of marijuana and cocaine, UMass police said.

Police said a Pittsfield man visiting the campus reported that $1,380 in cash and two speakers were stolen from his unlcoked car parked in front of the New Africa House.

Police said the man had come from his job at a bus terminal, and left the money in a bag inside the car.

Police said a 1976 Toyota Corolla, valued at $1,000, was reported stolen from section C of the North Village parking lot at 1:51 p.m. Saturday.

A 1978 Datsun, of an unknown value, was reported stolen from P lot at 1:38 p.m. Saturday, police said.

A 1982 Pontiac was recovered in lot 63 by UMass police one hour after it was reported stolen at 1:10 a.m Saturday, from the H section of the North Village parking lot, police said.

Police said a 19-year-old UMass student was arrested in Crampton dormitory at 4:53 a.m. sunday and charged with possession of an altered driver's license.

An 18-year-old UMass student was arrested at 2:41 a.m. Saturday and charged with being a minor in possession of alcohol when he was stopped on Stockbridge Road.

A 23-year-old Winchester man was arrested at 2 a.m. Sunday on Commonwealth Avenue and charged with having outstanding motor vehicle violations issued from the Springfield police department.

Peace within the rumblings

David Carney

Already the rumblings are in the air. The prospect for massive social change in the future is enhanced with each investment we make in the present. Each day the crazy-making questions face us. Should I buy a car and indulge my love for freedom of movement or should I use my money to attend workshops and buy literature on ageism and ableism? Should I study music and try to become a successful pop singer or should I major in psychology and learn to be a counselor? Should I spend my intersession skiing or working with a volunteer organization to send aid to the courageous revolutionaries in Central America?

I look at my bank account and find that I can't buy the car and get the literature and workshops. My calendar gets messy and useless when I schedule two simultaneous events for the weekend. My plans for the future fill me with despair when I face what I must do individually and collectively to live to a ripe age.

This is politics as I understand it — I have a certain amount of power and imagination which I can invest and apply toward anything I want. How much pleasure can I get out of it? The world tells me that it is either-or; that I can't have both. This notion of scarcity works on a societal level, too. U.S. leaders tell us that we can't sustain our economic system if other systems spread across the planet. They tell us we can't afford public transportation, social service programs, low taxes and a strong military defense. I'm brought up to believe I won't get a job without a "good" education. I'm supposed to believe that, with all the innovations in technology, and in spite of the fact that the planet produces an abundance of food, we can't figure out how to share it and stop the starvation of entire peoples.

These are some of the confusions which upset me about my world. What makes my life difficult as an inheritor of one of the richest lands on earth is that it is often easier to be momentarily happy than to find a resilient sanity. But I have begun to resist the notions of scarcity, the "safety" in military "defense," the righteousness of the U.S. economic system, and defiantly cherish those sadnesses, uncertainties and fears which disturb my states of happiness.

We are conditioned to deny our fears and insecurities; we label them "neurotic" and let only professionally-trained psychiatrists deal with neuroses and craziness though we encounter them daily. However, in such daily problems and fears we can find our humanity. Our inability to understand and enjoy everything can signal us to re-evaluate smaller portions of our life. This balancing process can reward us with glimpses of our true strengths and limitations. I have found that I cannot balance everything in my life alone. I have begun to reach out to others — with all my fears, because such fears show me the depth of my connection and commitment to living with other people.

As a gay man at UMass my life is often filled with fear. In the last week my activism was threatened by a hanging effigy, my dancing was threatened by a bomb, and walking on campus with a purple balloon and jeans was enough to provoke others to call me a "fucking faggot." Two years ago this would have devastated me completely, but now I trust that the shaking with fear and anger will pass momentarily. I have worked with the Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Men's Counseling Collective long enough to understand that I am not alone. Together, in our peer counseling with people coming out into their sexual orientations, our rap groups where we discuss our common experiences, and the social hours and dances where we meet each other and have fun; we are a strong, vibrant, focused culture, interconnected with others at the University. In the face of despair, my shared life with others gives me hope.

I know my friend was able to take his love for men to dispel the anger of people in a Southwest tower towards lesbian, bisexual and gay liberation in only two hours. I know that just before exams, in the freezing cold and with only fourteen hours of spontaneous organization, hundreds of lesbians, bisexuals, gay men and heterosexual allies can come together around the principles of non-violence and solidarity to transcend our fears of snowball attacks, verbal harassment and violence.

The rumblings at the University ring in solidarity with the struggles of those in Central America for their own authentic version of democracy, with hungry stomachs all over the planet, at the same time that supply trucks rumble into nuclear-armed bases and hostile planes antagonistically break sound barriers. What do university administrators and U.S. governmental leaders pledge to do to alleviate the rumbles and work for peace and social justice? Their official statement is "the policy is clear," that we stand against discrimination and harassment.

I don't need hanging effigies or nuclear destruction to be hurt; I was harassed when the first poster against my rights was hung, and every day by the nuclear armament of "superpower" countries. It is as much my responsibility to express the horror of my oppression as it is the administrators' responsibility to accept my horror on my terms.

In the past days I have realized that it is we who face our fears who provide leadership. Fear need not be disabling; it can be an invitation to share with others and can give us something in common to work for. I didn't fear a scarcity of food in working on the lesbian, bisexual and gay liberation rally; I just forgot to eat for two days because I was awed by our strength and task. I am convinced that answering all the above questions about myself and our society is an impossible task alone, but together, in only a few short hours we can redirect our courses against oppression. By taking individual responsibility for our personal fear and confusion on the steps of Whitmore and the Washington Monument we can stop individual threats and the nuclear threat to the planet. Each day the connections get clearer. Choose life.

More than just an 'accident'

Beatrix Hoffman

Last week, an American-owned Union Carbide pesticide plant in Bhopal, India began leaking poisonous gas. As of this writing, 2,500 people of Bhopal have died, and 125,000 more were affected by the gas.

The gas, methyl isocyanate, attacks the eyes, lungs and nervous system.

The Bhopal disaster is the worst industrial accident in history. Yet most Americans are not aware that one person per minute is poisoned by pesticides in the Third World, according to the World Health Organization. Pesticide production has become extremely profitable in the last 15 years. Annually, the industry produces one pound of pesticides for every person on earth. And many pesticides that have been banned in the U.S., such as DDT, are then sold to Third World countries by U.S. pesticide manufacturers. Most underdeveloped countries have few regulations governing the chemical industry, making Third World operations profitable for U.S. corporations. Union Carbide is one of the top pesticide manufacturers selling U.S.-banned chemicals to the Third World.

The gas that killed the people of Bhopal was not previously banned or restricted. Methyl isocyanate was being manufactured in Union Carbide's West Virginia plant until production was suspended last week. For years, the people of Institution, West Virginia have complained of the emissions from the Union Carbide plant. The residents suffer from eye and lung inflammation and an abnormally high cancer rate. Clearly, the tragedy of pesticide poisoning is not confined to the Third World.

Pesticides are thought of as beneficial to crop production. However, massive use of pesticides has resulted in insect breeds that are immune to pesticides. Also, the use of pesticides in the Third World has forced small farmers off the land, since pesticide farming is expensive and technology-intensive. The large farms using pesticides are mainly devoted to producing export crops, rather than food for the people of the country. The pesticide boom has actually led to an increase in hunger in the Third World.

Sadly, the tragedy in Bhopal may be a sign of what is yet to come. We have already caught glimpses of it here — Love Canal, Three Mile Island, Times Beach. Much of the food we purchase is highly contaminated with pesticides, and toxic chemicals continue to flow into our waters. If the Reagan administration continues to gut environmental and safety regulations, the future looks frightening.

We are capable of moving away from dependence on pesticides. Yet as long as pesticide manufacturing remains profitable, companies will continue to produce them no matter how many are killed. It is terrible that the people of Bhopal must suffer and die for the greed and thoughtlessness of a few. If Union Carbide is found guilty of criminal negligence, then so are all corporations that profit from products harmful to human life.

Beatrix Hoffman is a UMass student.

Quick, duck; quack, quack

Joseph McCormack

Why are there still ducks on the campus pond? The first fact about nature children learn is that ducks fly south for the winter. It is winter. Santa is already feeding Rudolph high-octane carrots. (And by the way, that's another hot issue — How much harmful radiation does Rudolph's nose give off?) Ask competent investigative journalists, and they will tell you, winter is here and those ducks should be gone. Yet they remain. Why?

Do they enjoy winter sports? Are they taking classes over intersession? Are they waiting for the Black Flag concert? A quick check of waterfowl guides suggests that duck behavior does not include skiing, education, or slam-dancing. No, the answer is rooted in the evils of the welfare state.

Somebody is feeding those ducks. The mallards are simply too lazy to fly south and rely on the goodwill of the community for handouts. Judging from the amount of noise they make, there is nothing wrong with them. If they want to stay around let them find work. A job as a Peking duck pays quite handsomely. It is time to clear the pond of those dead beats.

There are several feasible solutions for removing the pests:

1. Mine the campus pond.

2. Invite the National Rifle Association to hold their annual convention here.

3. Have roast duck in the Dining Commons for a week.

4. Let the ROTC finally hold war games on the pond.

5. Give one credit for each duck carcass turned in at the Registrar's office (with valid student ID, of course).

Sure, these are all workable solutions, but imagine the outcry of the liberals. Those damned liberals have stood in the way of progress too many times. The Kennedys would lead a holy war. The Governor would change his name to Duckakis and Tip would be orating on the nightly news for a month. Mondale might even venture out of his Minnesota sanctuary. Somehow the liberals would block the proposal.

The solution must be borrowed from the geniuses of the Reagan administration. It could be aptly named Duckanomics. First, cut back on the handouts that every duck gets and then make half the ducks ineligible for the program. Cut back on the student loans of the ducks in school and then "simplify" their tax codes.

Public outcry would be substantial at first, but get the economics department to publish graphs, write reports, and invent new words. The outcry will diminish in the confusion. The next step is to take the money saved and create an across-the-board tuition break. Afterwards, the liberals won't make a peep.

The ducks will be forced to move to some polluted urban puddle and the pond will be cleared for the swans of the wor[illegible].

Joseph McCormack is a Collegian correspondent.

Concepto Latino highlights segment from Puerto Rico

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

A Christmas cultural and musical segment from WIPR, a government run station in Puerto Rico will highlight Concepto Latino's show on WMUA this Thursday at the University of Massachusetts.

Luis Melendez, a Concepto Latino dee jay and a University Without Walls student who acquired the pre-recorded material said there will also be similar program for "Three Kings Day" on January 6.

Melendez said he has also made contact with Radio Universidad, the University of Puerto Rico's radio station and they have expressed interest in sending material.

Concepto Latino is a news and music program catering to the Latino community founded in 1976 with a three hour show.

"It allows people interested in broadcasting and communication the chance to get experiences in the fields and to get a tast of what it is like to be a dee jay," Melendez said.

But Concepto Latino is not only playing music, according to Melendez. Throughout its history, the program has set aside time to discuss issues relevent to Latin America.

At present, the program has various musical segments which are culturally enriching, he said. For example, the Saturday afternoon show combines music from South America and the Caribbean. The Thursday morning program has a segment dedicated to a favorite artist with input from the public. There is also a nutrition spot on the Friday show, he said.

Melendez added female participants in the program have also been a "very important part of Concepto Latino."

"Women are important members of our community. Among Latinos, there have been many outstanding women in traditional and popular music. A feminine voice on the radio adds a very special touch in Concepto Latino," he added.

Ivan Rothkegel, Concepto Latino program director said the program is trying to get away from the traditional musical scheme to provide their public with other kinds of music.

Rothkegel added every dee jay brings his or her own uniqueness to the program with their diverse backgrounds and musical taste.

Carlos Caban's "Eve" a powerful and enigmatic portrait of women on display at the Augusta Savage Gallery in the New Africa House at UMass until December 14.

Downtown Amherst

Doonesbury By Garry Trudeau

BOOPSIE, LET'S START WITH THE GOOD STUFF. I HEAR YOU'VE BEEN SPENDING A LOT OF TIME OUT AT THE PLAYBOY MANSION!
YES. HEF'S A GOOD FRIEND. HE'S BEEN VERY HELPFUL WITH MY CAREER.
REALLY? LIKE HOW?
WELL, LIKE MY BREAKTHROUGH ROLE IN "PORKY'S II." HEF WAS THE ONE WHO SENT ME UP FOR THE PART!
NO KIDDING. UH, WHAT ROLE WAS THAT AGAIN?
THIRD GIRL IN SHOWER.
I JUST THINK IT'S GREAT THE WAY HE SUPPORTS WOMEN IN THE ARTS

TODAY'S WEATHER

TODAY: YUK — Drizzle early with a partly sunny skies in the afternoon, highs ranging from 45-50.
TONIGHT: Clearing with lows 25-30.
TOMORROW: Increasing clouds in the morning with a chance of showers later in the day. HIghs near 50.

CONGRATULATIONS BAT BRAIN! YOU'VE DESTROYED THE LAST SUPER VILLIAN!
I DID WHAT?!
YEP! YOU'VE MADE THE WORLD SAFE FOR ALL PEOPLE: BLACK OR WHITE, GAY OR STRAIGHT, MAN OR WOMAN! NOW THE ONLY THING THEY HAVE LEFT TO FIGHT IS EACH OTHER!
THIS CAN'T BE.
WHAT'S THE MATTER? I FIGURED YOU'D BE HAPPY.
HAPPY!?! I JUST PUT MYSELF OUT OF WORK!
YEH, BUT WHAT ABOUT YOUR MAKING THE WORLD SAFE FOR DEMOCRACY?
WHOOPIE DING.

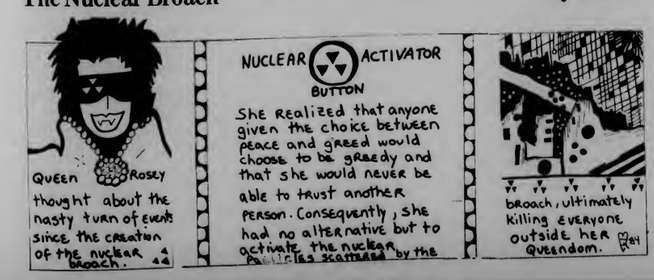
The Nuclear Broach By NRC



Queen Rosey thought about the nasty turn of events since the creation of the nuclear broach.
NUCLEAR ACTIVATOR BUTTON
She realized that anyone given the choice between peace and greed would choose to be greedy and that she would never be able to trust another person. Consequently, she had no alternative but to activate the nuclear particles scattered by the broach, ultimately killing everyone outside her Queendom.

UMass needs a hand vs. BU

If Smith's out, Terriers will have advantage

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

Both the University of Massachusetts and Boston University basketball teams need victories to get their seasons back on course as the teams clash tonight at the Springfield Civic Center.

The Minutemen, 2-2, are coming off a stinging 63-59 loss at Hartford on Saturday while the 1-4 Terriers have dropped four straight, the last being an 83-70 loss to Southern California.

The Minutemen may be without the services of point guard Carl Smith, their offensive key. Smith strained the tendons in his right hand in a collision with Connecticut's Earl Kelley last Thursday. He started, but played little of the first half against Hartford before playing most of the second half despite being unable to move his hand to shoot.

Smith said after the Hartford game that he would try to play and all indications are that the 5-10 sophomore will start the game.

UMass coach Ron Gerlufsen said that the injury is being treated on a day-to-day basis and a decision will be made before game time as to Smith's status.

Ticket Information

There's no reason you can't go see UMass basketball.

Take a study break and go see the Minutemen face Boston University tonight at the Springfield Civic Center.

Get your ticket by either going to the Boyden Ticket Office during the day or showing up at the Civic Center Box Office before the game. Bring an ID.

To hop the bus, get to Boyden at 6:00 p.m. tonight and reserve your place. It's first come, first serve for 120 people. UMass officials said that three buses will be available tonight until it can be determined how many people want to go to each game.

Best of all, it's all FREE. The ticket and the bus, the Trustees picked it all up. The buses leave after the game as they fill up.

The game will be good, the beer's cold (that costs however), and the Minutemen need your support. So get down there.

The Terriers, who have beaten UMass five straight times since 1977, are a guard-oriented team that depends on a good press and a fast breaking offense. They are also a much better team than their 1-4 record indicates.

After beating Merrimack, BU lost to North Carolina, Bowling Green, Iowa and USC, all good teams, with the Tar Heels and Hawkeyes national powers.

Second year coach John Kuester has four starters returning from a 16-13 team including guards Shawn Teague and Dwayne Vinson.

Teague, a 6-2 playmaker, is averaging 12.2 points this season and 4.8 assists. 6-5 forward Paul Hendricks, the ECAC North Atlantic player-of-the-week, is averaging 16.8 points-per-game and 8.5 rebounds.

Off the bench, 6-2 freshman guard Frederick Irving (12 ppg) and 6-3 Jim Christian have seen a lot of time. The other starters include 6-8 center Tom Ivey and 6-5 forward Mike Alexander.

The Terriers, like UMass have struggled shooting from the floor. BU was at 30 percent in the second half of the USC game and stands at 42 percent for the season. They are, unlike UMass, shooting a solid 78 percent from the line. The Minutemen are 44 percent from the field and only 61 percent from the line. BU was outrebounded in nine of its 13 losses last year.

UMass matches up with forwards Harace Neysmith (12.3 ppg and 8.3 rebounds), Bobby Braun (8.0 and 8.0) and Darryl Carter (6 ppg) or Ron Young (5 ppg).

The backcourt will probably be Smith (8.8 points and 3.5 assists) and the streaking Donald Russell (15 ppg and 3.3 rebounds).

Should Smith be unable to play, Gerlufsen will have to decide between freshman Lorenzo Sutton or Carter at the point.

Sutton (2.8 ppg and two assists in 49 minutes) is still learning the offense and failed to get the ball inside against Hartford. Carter is a flashy offensive player, but has had his problems on defense.

The Terriers figure to throw a lot of presses, both full court and man-to-man at the Minutemen tonight. They are a quick, up-tempo team that likes a quick game, the type of game Smith excels in.

UMass forward Ron Young fires a jump shot against Hartford on Saturday night. The Minutemen face Boston University tonight in Springfield at 7:30 p.m.

"We really need Smitty against them," UMass assistant coach Neil Rosa said. "He's the type of player you need against a BU type of team."

Following the Hartford loss, the Minutemen need a good effort before facing a tough Northeastern squad at home on Saturday afternoon. In only their second home game of the season, the slumping Minutemen would like to come away with a better feeling for the season than the one they have now.

MINUTEMEN MUTTERINGS: Russell needs only 297 points to tie UMass all-time leader Mike Pyatt ('79). That's an average of 12.9 the rest of the way...Here's the stats on UM's early-signee, David Brown. The 6-5 guard/forward is captain of Baltimore's Cardinal Gibbons and averaged five points as a junior. He averaged six rebounds a game and chose UM over Xavier and Detroit...In Atlantic 10 statistics after two games, Neysmith is fifth in rebounding, Braun is ninth. Russell is 12th in scoring and Smith is fifth in steals...Smith has started all 33 games in his UMass career...Neysmith has started 87 of the 88 games he's played in. John King is the player who does the dunking in the Hall-of-Fame commercials.

Recruiting: UMass coaches work hard now for next season

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

They call, visit, write, plead and beg. Every University of Massachusetts coach, from football to track, spends a good portion of their day trying to get good high school athletes to come here.

"You have to go to the good players, and the not-so-good ones come to you, it's a matter of deciding who's who," women's soccer coach Kalekeni Banda said.

The coaches most heavily involved in recruiting right now include football coach Bob Stull, Banda, basketball coach Ron Gerlufsen, baseball coach Dick Berquist and lacrosse coaches Dick Garber and Pam Hixon.

Stull reported that the Minutemen are still evaluating and visiting over 50 players, including one in Canada and in most Eastern states.

"I'm going to New Jersey now and most of the assistants are on the road and have been since the season started," Stull said. "You have to work at it. We're looking at all positions."

Banda is hot on the trail of four players, Texas' Tracy Bates, Virginia's Wendy Gebaeur and Brithee Hegstad (via Norway) and Massachusetts' Michelle Powers.

"We're good enough to pick our players," Banda, the coach of the nation's third ranked team, said. "We visit them, they visit us. I'm optimistic we can get some."

Basketball coach Ron Gerlufsen and his staff are visiting players nearly every day, mostly in the New Jersey-New York area. UMass has already signed one player and is looking for the elusive seven footer to play the middle.

"Recruiting's the key to your program, you do it now or you pay in the future," Gerlufsen said. "It's part of every coach's life."

Gymnasts take second at UMass Invitational

By ANNE TAUGER
Collegian Correspondent

The University of New Hampshire won the UMASS Invitational for the second consecutive year Friday night at Boyden gym, finishing ahead of the host UMass women's gymnastics team.

Coach Charles Shiebler was pleased with his team's outcome in their opening meet.

"This was a big meet, and the team handled the pressure very well. Hosting the event made it even more stressful, but they really seemed to keep their composure," Shiebler said.

Junior Lisa Griffin placed third in the all-around with a score of 34.35 and tied for first in the vaulting competition with a 9.0 mark to lead the Minutemen.

"I haven't competed all-around in three years. I was so nervous. I'm very happy with my performance and I have more confidence now," Griffin said.

The gymnasts top event was the vault where they won with a team score of 43.1. Their performance on the balance beam

The gymnasts top event was the vault where they won with a team score of 43.1. Their performance on the balance beam was unexceptional with an overall mark of 38.65

The Minutemen's scheduled meet with Yale on Sunday was postponed until intersession when they will next compete.

Minutemen enjoy weekend

Both the University of Massachusetts men's and women's indoor track teams enjoyed success in its final action before Intersession this past weekend.

The men took a four-way meet at Boston University over Lowell, Southern Conn. and Bentley with 67 points.

Winners for UMass included Eric Winer in the 600 (1:13.8), Rawle Crichlow in both the 60 (6.5) and the 400 (:50.0), Paul Stanislawzyk in the 2 mile (8:54.2) and both the one and two mile relay teams. Wayne Levy also set a school record in the 5,000 with a 14:24.4.

The two mile relay team of Jack Marinilli, Bill Stewart, Jan Novack and Steve Tolley wrapped up the meet with their run.

On the women's side, the Minutemen turned several good performances in a non-scoring meet.

Bridgett Booker won the 60 in 7.0, tying a school record, Sue Goldstein took the 400 meters in :59.3, Kayla Morrison was second in the 200 at :26.0 and third in the 60 in 7.1.

Leah Loftis was third in the 400 at 59.5, while freshman Sarah Kitchell took third in the 1,000 at 2:47, her best time to date.

Both teams will be off until early January. Men's coach Ken O'Brien and women's mentor Kalekeni Banda said they expected good post-holiday seasons.

UM employee sues Amherst, Chief of police

By GREG BROWN
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts employee has filed a $400,000 lawsuit against the Amherst police chief and the town, claiming that his civil rights were violated in an incident two years ago.

Scott Tymkowiche, 21, a former UMass student, filed the suit Monday in Hampshire District Court. The suit alleges that Chief Donald Maia failed to properly investigate incidents of police brutality against people placed in custody.

Tymkowiche said he filed a similar suit in 1982 in U.S. District Court in Springfield. That suit reportedly charges several Amherst police officers with civil rights violations.

Attorneys often file suits in both state and federal court because of differences in civil rights jurisdiction between the two courts.

The second suit claims that Tymkowiche, who was arrested Oct. 17, 1982, was beaten while in handcuffs by an Amherst police officer. The incident occurred at the Amherst police station.

The suit also claims that Maia failed to conduct "adequate" investigation into the allegations of police brutality.

Tymkowiche an Amherst resident, said the suit will come to trial Jan. 7, but refused to comment further. He now works as a janitor for the University.

The suit is seeking damages for civil rights violations and defamation of Tymkowiche's character.

Tymkowiche and his father filed a citizen's action complaint against the officer who allegedly beat him, the suit said. It also alleges that Maia has been negligent in conducting other investigations of police misconduct.

Maia was unavailable for comment.

UMass laboratory funds called 'dismal'

Faculty says new equipment, needed renovations are lacking

By CHRIS POON
Collegian Staff

Despite a 200 percent increase in funding for laboratory equipment and renovations over the past three years, some faculty members still say that funding is grossly inadequate.

"This year is the first time in a long time when a good slug of renovation and repair money has come in," said Seymour Shapiro, a botany professor. "But we need four times as much money to keep the buildings from falling apart."

"The allocation of equipment money to each department is never even as high as 25 percent of the department's request," Shapiro said.

"We hope to fix some of the buildings and labs on campus with the money from the capital budget," said Justin Cobb, director of space management. He said Marhsall Hall will be the first building to undergo complete structure and systems renovations.

Director of Financial Affairs Paul Page, who is also acting director of the budget office, said more money is going into the equipment and maintenance accounts.

"There was over a 200 percent increase from 1981 to 1984 in the (equipment) account," Page said. He said the account pays for typewriters, trucks and classroom equipment.

"The (equipment) account has always been short changed," said Otto Stein, chairman of the budget allocation committee of the Faculty Sentate. Stein said equipment is seldom repaired or replaced in the University's laboratories.

Stein said that state funding for new equipment is dismal. "Eighty percent of our up-to-date equipment was obtained through grant money," he said.

"Some courses are using equipment that has been discarded by high schools," he said. "We don't even have some of the most common tools, such as scanning electron microscopes," he said.

Stein said these microscopes, which cost between $60,000 and $80,000 should be routinely accessible to all students.

"The microscopes we're using now were modern 20 to 30 years ago," he said.

"We're supposed to have special state allocations to play catch-up for equipment replacement from the capital outlay budget, but the allocations haven't been regularly given out," he said, adding that 1984 was the first year the University has received additional money from the state legislature in several years.

Shapiro said that in the past, the University was more interested in building a budget for personnel rather than equipment. He said the need and importance for new equipment must be raised at the University and in the legislature.

"If this University claims to be first rate, part of being first rate means training students for today," Shaprio said.

$500g proposal may preserve land

By JOHN YONCE
Collegian Staff

A study by a planning class at the University of Massachusetts contributed to a $500,000 proposal by the Amherst planning board that may help preserve open spaces in Amherst.

The proposal, which would create an emergency fund to preserve areas not covered by two current preservation programs, will be included in the town manager's capital outlay budget in January and then must be voted on at Town Meeting in May, according to Dorothy Robinson, chairwoman of the town planning committee.

The study recommended that the town act to preserve tracts of land along North East and South East Streets. The planning board then decided to request financing for a fund to protect open spaces in all of Amherst, Robinson said.

"In the last couple of years, on South East Street, several tracts have been taken out of 61A (a state law which gives lower tax rates to property kept in agricultural status) and developed," Robinson said. "The town had the option to buy these tracts, but the money wasn't there," she said.

NATO war scenario has happy ending

WASHINGTON (AP)—In the secret files where such nightmares are kept, many scenarios describe the opening days of World War III.

One version—based on a strategy called "the follow-on force attack"—has attracted public attention lately, partly because it has a happy ending. Here it is:

Sometime in the future, say 1995, tensions between the Soviet Union and the 16-member North Atlantic Treaty Organization grow dangerous, and negotiations fail.

The 2.9 million-man NATO army, including roughly 300,000 Americans, and the 4-million strong Soviet bloc forces line up on both sides of the East-West border.

Counting on the desire of both sides to avoid nuclear weapons, the Soviets launch a conventional attack. Their aim is to use their massive tank divisions to crush the outgunned defenders and force them into a quick surrender.

The first days of fighting are fierce, but the allies are confident they can hold the leading edge of the Soviet offensive without using "battlefield" atomic weapons that surely would trigger a worldwide nuclear holocaust.

Behind the East Bloc lines, waiting for a weak point in the defense, are the bulk of the Soviet armies.

Manned NATO fighter-bombers and Lance and cruise missiles, armed with "smart" munitions that don't miss, hit the masses of waiting Soviet tanks, planes, and troops.

Airfields, roads and railroads are knocked out with remote-controlled mines and "runway buster" ammunition.

The Red Army's follow-on forces are wiped out, the attack stalls, and the war ends in either a stalemate or an allied victory without a nuclear shot being fired.

Gen. Bernard Rogers, NATO's top commander, dislikes calling it a "new strategy" since it's always been NATO policy to attack forces in the rear, if possible because of the new weapons, he says.

For more than three years, Rogers has argued that without such plans and the high-tech weapons to carry them out, he would have to ask a president for authorization to use nuclear weapons within days of the outbreak of a conflict.

Calling the new concept "dangerous doctrine," the Soviet Communist Party newspaper, Pravda, said last month the plan "cast off the defensive mask" which NATO had worn during the post-war period.

Jose Napoleon Duarte's government won't be fighting leftist rebels this Christmas.

Rebels call holiday truce

MEXICO CITY (AP) - Salvadoran leftist rebels Tuesday announced a truce for the Christmas and New Year holidays and said they would limit their military activities to defensive purposes during those periods.

A communique from the rebel leadership said the decision was taken "as a sign of the disposition to advance in the creation of conditions that might favor the solution of the conflict by way of dialogue and negotiation."

It said the truce would be in effect from midnight Dec. 23 until midnight Dec. 26 for Christmas and from midnight Dec. 30 until midnight Jan. 2.

The announcement was made in a joint communique from the general command of the Farabundo Marti National liberation Front, the umbrella group for guerrilla factions fighting the U.S.-supported Salvadoran government, and the executive committee of the Democratic Revolutionary Front, the guerrilla's political ally.

Monitor goofs

FARGO, N.D. (AP) - The Christian Science Monitor is embarrassed and its crossword puzzle editor claims he's amazed how many Easterners know that the capital of North Dakota is Bismarck, and not Pierre, S.D.

Puzzle producer Charles Preston said his telephone was ringing off the hook Monday with calls from crossword puzzle fans telling him about his mistake in a puzzle last week, which placed Bismarck in South Dakota.

Sen. Quentin Burdick, I-N.D., was among numerous Monitor crossword puzzle fans who caught the error. He sent the Monitor editor a tongue-in-cheek letter declaring, "This piracy must stop!"

Monitor staffer David Thomas says he tries to "backstop" Preston on his words in the puzzle, but missed last week's error.

"The trick would have been to put in Pierre in stead of 'Bismarck is its capital' in the clue," Thomas told the Fargo Forum in a telephone interview from Boston.

"We're embarrassed," he said.

King in '86? Many voters say no

BOSTON (AP) - As former Gov. Edward J. King weighs a re-run for the Statehouse in 1986, he faces a large number of Massachusetts voters who hold a low opinion of him, according to a new statewide poll released Tuesday.

The survey by MRK Research of Boston, a company founded by three former King aides, found 40 percent of voters questioned said they had an unfavorable opinion of King, including 10 percent who felt he was one of the worst public figures in the state.

Thirty-two percent of the sample had a positive opinion toward King, including 3 percent who felt the Democrat was one of the best public figures in the state.

In comparison, Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, who is expected to seek another term in November 1986, received a favorable rating from 71 percent of those questioned, including 14 percent who felt he was one of the best public figures in the state.

Seventeen percent had a negative opinion of Dukakis, including 4 percent who felt he was one of the worst.

"Taking a quick look at those numbers, King has a long row to hoe," said one Bay State political analyst, who asked not to be identified. "Obviously things might change if he decides to run as independent, but I would say that's a very high negative."

President of faculty union leaves bargaining table

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

Reduced conflicts with the administration, better collective bargaining and improved representation of University of Massachusetts professors and librarians are some accomplishments of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, under James Boylan.

Boylan, 56, who will step down as president of MSP at Amherst before his two-year term ends to go on sabbatical, says his tenure has been a "period of consolidation."

Boylan said his term in the union has not been an especially "innovative administration" because his predecessors opened the path for better communications between the union and the administration.

"In prior years, we've had more difficulties," Boylan said. "The administration was against the union and we never had collective bargaining until 1977 (when the union was formed). Those were difficult days."

Some of the "difficult days" include the settlement of the latest faculty contract, which involved 45 involved negotiation sessions during a year of bargaining which ended last spring. The salary increases and a grievance procedure for MSP "is finally catching up with pay gaps, especially with librarians," he said.

"We have a line of improving relations but we are still held back by the complexities of the contract," Boylan said.

Boylan said the contract has started to correct the salaries "but not the structure" of the faculty pay scale.

He said one of the high points of his term was the court victory of former UMass art history professor Ann Mochon who was denied tenure in 1980 by the University. Mochon and MSP took her case to civil court and won last spring.

"The Ann Mochon case was not so much that we succeeded by campus support but those who once opposed the union and administration showed campus solidarity," he said. "We sent 600 signatures to the president (David C. Knapp) that was a key in getting the case resolved."

Arlyn Diamond, an English professor, will succeed Boylan when his term ends in January.

Boylan, who is also director of journalistic studies, said he will use his year long sabbatical to write a book on the muckrakers, investigative reporters who exposed the ills of society in the early 20th century.

Howard Ziff, former director of journalistic studies, will fill in for Boylan during his sabbatical.

Ziff said of Boylan, "I'm sorry to see him leave."

'Losing a generation'

Panel says youths abusing drugs

By DANIEL WHITE
Collegian Staff

Participants in a panel discussion held last night in the Campus Center asserted that drug and alcohol among high school aged students in Massachusetts is getting out of control.

"We're losing a whole generation of adolescents (to drugs)," said Dr. Ronald Loescher, a member of the Amherst Committee on Drugs. "We've lost the spiritual foundation of our culture and we must find it again.

"We are searching for some basic need and we're taking chemicals to try and find it."

The panelists included Loescher, Phillip Cavanaugh, the associate director of the Department of Public Safety at the Univeristy of Massachusetts, and Carlene Riccelli, a senior staff health educator at University Health Services.

Cavanaugh quoted from a poll taken recently of students in the ninth to twelfth grades. The study revealed that 97 percent of these students use alcohol often, 60 percent use one or more illicit drugs, and nine percent had been drunk while in school and 20 percent had gone to classes while under the influence of marijuana. The poll also revealed that marijuana was the drug of choice, while amphetamines ran second. There was also no significant difference in the numbers of drug users between males and females. Also shown by the poll was that students found drugs readily accessible and that they felt the schools' rules did not prevent drug use.

Cavanaugh added that he felt that drug education should start in kindergarten. He concluded by saying that "they are selling through music, especially heavy metal, the use of drugs, sex and satanism."

Riccelli revealed that the most popular drugs at UMass were alcohol, marijuana, and cocaine, in that order. Other drugs experienced seasonal abuse, such as speed around finals and hallucinogens around Halloween.

She also said that UMass has numerous counseling services to help people with drug or alcohol related problems. She emphasized the need for peer counseling.

Holiday season may exacerbate bulimia, 'tragic' eating disorder

By PETER MENTOR
Collegian Correspondent

Bulimics should be aware of their eating disorder and should be especially careful during the 'high stress' holiday season.

"With the depression during the holidays, I can't tell you how many (bulimics') lives are so tragic," Mary Jane Mijal of the Anorexia Nervosa Aid Society (ANAS) said.

Bulimia is an eating disorder which is characterized by binge-purge behavior - overeating followed by intentional vomiting.

"People don't realize that it's addictive. You're not thinking of worries or pressures. It gets to numb your feelings," former bulimic Lindsey Hall Cohn said.

Bulimia was once a way of life for Cohn, who would binge and purge five times a day. "It becomes an everyday thing, even in your dreams," Cohn said. "It's addictive, even more than heavy drugs (like) heroin," she said.

To go on a binge is to get a lot of food, eat it quickly and get rid of it by throwing up or by using laxatives, Cohn said.

"You eat a few calories over (the limit) you have set for yourself, then decide to binge. You know you're doing something naughty, then you get to reprieve yourself. It's fun to eat all that food. There's a high physically for yourself," Cohn said.

Support groups can help the bulimic in realizing a "normal relationship to food and fatness by focusing attention on eating behaviors and emotional reasons for an eating problem," according to Dr. Robert Brandt of FACE, (Focus Awareness of Compulsive Eating).

Leslea Fishel, of What Are You, What's Eating You, a self-help group in Northampton, said her organization helps women "make the changes they want to make. The behavior will not go away until the emotional problems leave," she said.

Although bulimia has only recently been recognized as a disease by the medical community, there are ways to cure it.

"You have to talk about it. You have to confide in people. It's possible that you can't get better yourself, so you really need to get support. You need to make contact outside bulimia," Cohn said.

He said students must be trained to use the most modern equipment to prepare them for the real world after graduation. But without a significant increase in equipment money, the University's laboratories cannot be fully modernized, he said.

"There will always be laboratory needs, they'll never be perfect," Cobb said. "Goesmann was renovated this summer and there are already new needs.

"The University is not young physically, most of the (laboratory) space is 27 years old," he said. He added that there is a need for an internal upgrading of research space to keep up with modern technology.

Shapiro said most lab equipment is secured through research grants written by individual professors. The equipment helps people doing the research but it doesn't always satisfy teaching needs, he said.

"If this University claims to be first rate, part of being first rate means training students for today," Shapiro said.

Amherst may see more late-night buses

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Graduate Student Senate voted last night to provide $1053 in partial funding for a spring semester trial run of additional late-night buses from Amherst center.

According to Doug Lenz, vice-chair of the UMass Transit Advisory Board, the funding would provide late night bus service to students who have been studying on campus or drinking in Amherst center bars late at night.

Lenz said that buses for North Amherst, South Amherst, Sunderland, and Belchertown Road currently stop running at about 12:30 a.m. on the weekends. The new bus schedule would provide buses for these four routes until almost 2:00 a.m., Thursday through Saturday, he said.

Lenz said that projected ridership for these extra buses is 200 or more riders each night. Lenz noted that future funding for these buses may come from other sources if the projected figures prove accurate.

"As soon as the service is there and we can show that it's being used, then we can go to the state for funding," Lenz said.

Lenz said the University Commission on Alcohol Use initiated the proposal to prevent drunken driving by late-night bar patrons, and that the commission had promised $ 500 for the buses. The UMass Transit Advisory Board has also requested that the Undergraduate Student Senate contribute $2500 for the buses, he said.

The Pioneer Valley Transit Authority will not fund the extra buses until their feasibility is determined by such a trial basis, Lenz said, adding, "Until then, students have to take the initiative."

★ Land

Two laws currently protect open land, according to Robinson. One offers farmers the option to sell the development rights to their land in return for promising not to develop it. The other, chapter 61A, offers a lower tax rate to farmers who keep their land in an undevelopable category.

"Massachusetts is somewhat unique," Robinson said. "There is a lot of need to preserve open space...we're anxious to protect all types of land."

"Amherst is in the forefront of development rights and open space preservation," she said.

Robinson said that the board requested $500,000 so it could conceivably buy "several farms," but that any land purchases by the town would be short-term and the fund would be revolving, with land sold to people who would keep it open.

"We're asking for a significant amount of money," Robinson said, "but everyone in town will benefit, even though the land might not be right next to everyone."

Think of the Coffee Shop's future

The University Store has proposed to use the Campus Center Coffee Shop to expand their clothing line to alleviate their space problems. The Campus Center Board of Governors felt it necessary to inform the UMass population of these proposals, which have serious implications on student space usage.

Yes, the Campus Center Store has a space problem, but so do the students that utilize the Campus Center for studying, eating, and socializing.

This proposal from the Store raises some very important questions concerning the goals and priorities of the Campus Center administration. What exactly is the priority of the Campus Center administration? According to the Campus Center Annual Report, their priority is to generate the necessary income to keep the Campus Center running. But what role does student interest play in the running of this building?

This issue has been faced by the Board of Governors for many years, and in light of this University Store proposal, it is time to address it.

Aside from each student's Campus Center fee, the students also support this building with their purchases. This is a university, a place of learning, not a business that treats the students as a source of income. By paying the Campus Center fee and being the main source of income for the various Campus Center facilities, we must also have a say in how our money is spent, and how the facilities are structured.

The voice of the students must be heard. We all must come forward and veto the store proposal. But this is only the first step. The next is to have student rights be the first priority in the operation of the Campus Center as well as campus-wide. The time spent at UMass goes by too quickly to make any changes that can affect you personally. But think of your younger brothers, and sisters, and the future generations that will come to UMass. Each year the University Store attempts to expand into the Coffee Shop, and each year the strength of Student Government weakens. If this trend continues we may someday not only lose the Coffee Shop, but other areas of vital interest to the student body. So for the future let's strengthen Student Government today.

As Chair of the BOG it is disappointing to think that maybe students really don't care what happens to their money, and more importantly their rights as students. Prove to me that you're not apathetic and give that extra effort to help bring student representation back to where it belongs, in the hands of the students.

'Wise up or transfer out'

This is an open letter to those "mature" college students who were "playing" near Van Meter Dormitory on the night of Wednesday December 6-7, at 2:30 a.m. Thank you for conducting yourselves in an "exemplary" manner that night, screaming at the top of your lungs while people were trying to sleep. Thank you for rampaging down the hall of a dormitory you didn't reside in, after someone was nice enough to let you in so you wouldn't get in trouble with campus authorities. Also I was very pleased when you opened my door and others' down the hall, throwing snowballs, which you forgot to leave outside, and throwing them into my room and hitting my sleeping roommate. I hope you are proud of what you did.

There is nothing wrong with having snowball fights outside, but the snow belongs outside. Also, when a door is shut at 2:30 a.m., it would be logical to assume that people are sleeping inside that room. I am sure that if I had done the same thing to one of you "wonderful" people, opening a door and throwing snowballs at a sleeping occupant, I would be punched in the face, or even worse. That is why I don't do such things, for I love my neighbor as I do myself. You know who you are. This letter is also addressed to those who decided that night to break windows at UMass and at Amherst College, harass pizza deliverers and bus drivers, as well as punching a police officer in the face.

If you were truly mature, you would have done none of these things except play harmlessly, quietly, and in your own residential area. The "commendable" actions described in the first paragraph are the very reasons why UMass is stuck with the offensive and degrading label "ZooMass." UMass and its students are trying to present the University as a superior place of higher education, and you are ruining it for us. If I were you, I would think of my neighbor, wise up, or transfer out.

Barrel of fun? It's all trash

We don't know about you, but we refuse to touch that disgusting excuse for a garbage bucket that has recently made its appearance in the Worcester Dining Common. After waiting in line for what seems like an eternity, you get to the front and realize what has caused the delay.

In an attempt to dispose of your trash, the objectionable barrel refuses to accept what it has been designed for—garbage. Instead of taking the trash like a real barrel, this aberation swings its unsanitary cover back and forth, and covers your hand with whatever sludge the person before you could not force the barrel to take. Due to the objectionable barrel, the surrounding floor is covered with congealed condiments. A very unsightly picture.

Give us back the wide-mouthed, uncovered, accepting barrels we've grown to love and appreciate!

If it is determined that the pseudo-barrel is an integral part of the waste disposal process of Worcester D.C., maybe students should be awarded Snickers Bars as a reward for teaching the barrel its lot in life. For those who fail, counseling should be made available.

Opening the doors

Doors. To hold them or not to hold them, that has become the question. Whether 'tis nobler to suffer the slings and arrows of outrageous indignation, or to take arms against a sea of doors and by opposing stop them—from slamming into the person following behind you.

Like it or not, doors have become a political symbol in our society...to hold or not to hold. And now by "hold," I do not mean the gallant gesture of the 1940s movie during which the actor's hat falls off as a result of his bending low but, rather the effort taken to insure that the door you open doesn't close on the next person coming through the doorway. An effort that I think reflects courtesy and implies a certain interconnectedness of people in society.

Once in a while though, a door is held out of courtesy and this sense of interconnectedness—without a glance behind to determine the follower's gender—but the symbol of the held door is misinterpreted as a political statement, implying a desire for continued subservience. What is inferred is not what was implied, but in the brief and anonymous encounter the follower cannot judge holder's thoughts, only his actions.

This anonymity of the holder to the follower is as much a cause of the result of that non-gender based door holding is now a political symbol as is the relationship of women to men in our society. It says something about the anonymity with which we live.

In a community as large as UMass, courtesy is not expected. This lack of expectation, combined with the fact that we live in an age in which roles are not as clearly defined as they once were, and in a society wherein we do not have the type of familiarity that breeds the feeling of interconnectedness that brings the expectation of the door being held simply out of courtesy, results in the fact that the follower cannot gauge the holder's intention but only his action, and the holder is judged, sometimes rightly, sometimes wrongly. To hold or not to hold...

OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

Where's our government?

The time has come to ask the Undergraduate Student Senate some questions about what it has done this semester.

The senate has for the past few years been unable to get out of its own way. Senators use the weekly meetings to air personal differences with each other, to play out their roles as would-be legislators, and to display to the 19,000 students they represent that they are ineffective.

This semester has been no exception. For every step forward the senate has taken, it has fallen two back.

A prime example was the senate's work on gay and lesbian rights. At the Sept. 26 meeting, senators voted down a motion passed by the Student Government Association Budgets Committee to bar funding to "sexual preference groups" like the People's Gay Alliance and the Lesbian Union. But three weeks later, they rejected a proposal to fund a Gay and Lesbian Awareness educator who would have provided counseling to students on homosexual rights and issues.

SGA leaders have made no concrete progress toward reaching an agreement with administrators on disputed proposals for revising the Code of Student Conduct. Last spring, Dean of Students William F. Field and Associate Dean Robert N. Brooks drafted provisions for "interim action," whereby a student could be suspended without a hearing, and for abolishing the practice of allowing lawyers to represent students before campus disciplinary boards.

SGA co-President Rick Patrick has rightly denounced these measures as infringements of student rights. Student leaders drafted their own revisions over the summer and planned to meet with Field and Brooks this semester to iron out the differences. But no such meeting has taken place.

The code, the last word on students' rights and responsibilities and University disciplinary procedures, has not undergone major revision for two decades. The SGA and the dean of students office agree that certain additions—such as rules against computer crime and more comprehensive definitions of racial and sexual harassment—are urgently needed. But Patrick says he doesn't "see any great rush" to produce mutually approved changes.

Other student concerns the SGA has been slow to address include the SGA constitution and revamping of the on-campus housing swing space policy.

The swing space issue, which affects all students unable to secure regular dormitory rooms at the beginning of the semester, has been on the senate's agenda for three weeks. Last week it fell prey to another fit of apathy when the 57 senators needed for quorum never assembled. This was the third time this semester that a session was adjourned because the senate could not muster enough of its members to hold a meeting.

Work on the constitution, which would give students more influence on administrative procedures if passed by the Trustees, has been left to SGA co-President and student Trustee Jim Keller, who cannot do it alone.

Time has always been important to students. The more of it student senators spend fighting among themselves, the more of it SGA leaders spend procrastinating and congratulating themselves, the more we will lose.

We need a strong voice at our university, and we deserve better representation.

Unsigned editorials reflect the majority opinion of the Collegian's Board of Editors.

Not exactly my best wishes

William J. Spain

I don't want anybody to think that I've gone soft all of a sudden. Some of my friends were circulating just such a vicious rumor after reading my mushy foray into sentimentality of last Friday. It is in the interest of dispelling any such notions that I now declare 'tis the season to present my bitter (and frequently abusive) worst wishes for the coming year. In this spirit, I have compiled a list of bad boys and girls whose stockings should be filled by Santa's reindeer. Here we go—

•The Mexican Army. You guys destroyed ten thousand tons of my favorite combustible this year. I swear, that should be illegal.

•Hecklers. I don't care how fashionable you are. You all deserve to develop acute laryngitis before every job interview and marriage proposal in your miserable lives.

•Whoever sets the prices for the Textbook Annex. How about doing us all a favor and going back to Transylvania with the rest of the bloodsucking parasites.

•Mrs. George Bush. Congratulations! You have won the grand prize for the lowest-class remark of this past (or any other) presidential election. A free scholarship to the Eddie Murphy School of Etiquette is all yours.

•Ray Shamie. It is my sincere hope that you spend all of your riches trying to get elected to some office and end up living in Roxbury waiting for welfare checks.

•Senator Jesse Helms. I include you here just on general principles.

•Louis Farrakhan. Ditto for you, loudmouth.

•All the voters in this great Commonwealth that somehow pulled levers for Ronald Reagan and John Kerry on the same day. In my estimation, the average laboratory rat has a better grasp of the issues than you do. Next time, stay at home and read GQ.

•Polluters. I would love to move you out of your cosy suburban homes and make you live in the shacks of Bhopal, India. Don't worry about your subdivisions falling into disrepair. The orphans will keep them up nicely.

•Terrorists. May the end of next year have all of you fanatics either rotting in jail or bleeding to death in the street. There is nothing even the slightest bit amusing about you and your antics.

•Americans who profess deep patriotism but think nothing of cheating on their taxes. Have you ever heard the cliche "put your money where your mouth is?"

•Everyone whose greatest ambition in life is to own an expensive car or three. This greeting is on behalf of the blighted children in the Republic of Idonwahna-Behungri.

•People who buy coats made out of lynx, fox, seal, or sable fur. Nothing would please me more than to watch you struggling in a leg trap until someone came along and skinned you. Must you use our animal neighbors as status symbols?

•Racists and bigots of all colors. If you are so displeased with your fellow passengers on Spaceship Earth, I will be happy to help you overboard. Just call me c/o the Collegian and I'll come around to your house.

In closing, I have to mention Augusto Pinochet, Wayne Newton, Idi Amin, George Steinbrenner, Jeane Kirkpatrick, swaggering cops, rapists, [illegible] assorted criminal slime, and everyone who violently objects to the nickname "ZooMass." See you next semester, fellow units.

A "strict" Santa hears requests for peace

By MICHELLE HYDE
Collegian Staff

World Peace, good grades, cars...those are some of the items that top the Christmas List for college students this year, according to one who would know: Santa Claus.

This Santa Claus does not receive holiday requests in the reclusive North Pole, but amidst the holiday hustle and bustle of the Hampshire Mall in Hadley, where hundreds of children and kids at heart sit on his lap to have a picture taken and to make their special requests.

Santa: the same requests...

Santa, alias Phillip Brooks, 66, of Florence, said he is "a strict Santa," and tells grownups the same thing he tells children:"Be good to your parents, your roommates, be honest with yourselves, and BRUSH YOUR TEETH, and I'll be good to you this Christmas."

Brooks, a retired postmaster, spends about 30 hours a week impersonating Santa Claus at the mall, and has said he looks through toy catalogs to keep up on the latest toys. He said he was hired as a Santa Claus after answering a job advertisement in a newspaper and has been Ho-Hoing every holiday season for four years.

Many of his customers are college students, who don't consider themselves too old to have their picture taken with Santa.

"You know, sometimes it's touching what these college kids will ask for for Christmas. This year they are asking for things like World Peace and an end to world hunger," Brooks said.

"Then again, you still hear the requests for blondes, brunettes, a date with a popular film star. A lot of them want good grades, and a lot of them want to get home safely. A lot of the girls want boyfriends and the boys want cars, just like it always has been," Brooks said.

Does he ever get tired?

...and the envelopes, please: Cinemascoop Awards '84

By COUNT RAMIN ZAHED
Collegian Staff

As the landmark year of 1984 is reaching its end, it is time once again to pick the best and the worst of the entertainment industry. The year marked the release of such popular films as Gremlins and Ghostbusters, film adaptations of classics like Under the Volcano and The Bostonians, and motion pictures about music makers ranging from Mozart to Prince. During the past twelve months, we also saw many embarrassing moments: Sheena of the Jungle, Dolly Parton's Rhinestone, and Stephen King's Children of the Corn were only a few of those Hollywood events we could easily do without. One could go on forever discussing the tragic turkeys. Therefore let us simply go ahead with the official 1984 annual Cinemascoop Christmas Awards.

Best Comeback 1984: Steve Martin

The Shirley Temple Award: (to a child performer who managed to turn our stomachs with her superficial ultracutesie mannerisms in two of the year's worst movies Firestarter and Irreconcilable Differences) Drew Barrymore.

The Huff-and-Puff-till-I-Blow-Your-House-Down Award: to Prince for his mascara and masculinity(!) in Purple Rain.

The Madonna Belly-Button Award: to aquawoman Darryl Hannah, for her smooth naivete and natural beauty in Splash.

The Reagan Approval Award: to director John Milius for his idiotic paranoid movie about a group of kids resisting the Russian invasion of America, Red Dawn.

The Butterfield Dorm Award: to a hip-cool-low-key-off-beat movie loved by the Liquid Sky generation, Repo Man.

The William Buckley Jr. Award: to a decadent, stuffy arts film saturated with ennui, Swann in Love, a film with a lot of nice furniture and very little plot, with Jeremy Irons trying to speak and look French, in vain.

The Joan Collins Award: to Kathleen Turner, who sizzled in Crimes of Passion and swooned in Romancing the Stone.

The Say-it-Ain't-So-Steve Award: to director Spielberg for a violent and disappointing sequel to Raiders of the Lost Ark.

The Jessica Lange/Sam Shepard Chemistry Award: to Richard Gere and Diane Lane in The Cotton Club.

The We-Only-Had-One-Good-Movie Award: to Nastassja Kinski and Dudley Moore who each came up with two flops not even comparing to Tess and Arthur.

The Miss Piggy Breakdance Award: to the slimy Gremlin who stole the show with his breakdance routine in the bar scene.

The Ed Jeye's Most Over-Rated Film Award: to Ghostbusters which was saved only by the brilliance of Bill Murray, who also tried to rescue The Razor's Edge, but failed.

The Anthony Perkins Insanity Award: to the readers of this column who waste their precious time reading the words of a madman.

That's all, folks. Until next semester, keep screening. Happy Holidays, Bonnes Vacances, Feliz Navidad, etc.

Holidays of light and hope

By NANCY A. BUKAR
Collegian Staff

The holiday season means more than just Christmas and Rudolph The Red-Nosed Reindeer.

The end of December marks a time of celebration for many religions and cultures, and the common themes of all are the celebration of lights and the coming of spring. The lighting of the candlabra for the Jewish Hanukkah and African Kwanza celebrations, and the electric lights on Christmas evergreens and on some houses, all signify the hope that from the dead of winter, spring will come again.

Winter Solstice, an ancient agricultural holiday celebrated on Dec. 21, welcomes the rebirth of the sun and the coming of light. The solstice is the shortest day of the year, and after that day, until the summer solstice June 21, the days become gradually longer.

For Jewish people, the holiday is known as Hanukkah, or the Festival of Lights. The literal translation means "rededication of the Altar" and celebrates the successful revolt against the Maccabees in 167 B.C. A Menorah (a candlabra with eight places) is lit each night for eight nights and gifts are given.

"Hanukkah represents a struggle for the freedom to live as Jews. They weren't allowed to practice the religion as they chose; it was a fight for religious and other liberties," Rabbi Saul Perlmutter of UMass Hillel said.

Hanukkah is also seen as a "representation of assimilation," Perlmutter said.

"Part of the message of Hanukkah is spiritual freedom," he said.

Third is the concept of the Festival of Lights. "This is the common aspect that is shared with just about every holiday at this time. It's a sense of the coming of light after winter," Perlmutter said.

Kwanza, the African celebration of the First Fruits, begins on Dec. 26 and ends Jan. 1. It is marked by the lighting of seven candles (one for each day) in a Kinara, a traditional candlabra. The candles represent the seven principles, considered to be the foundation of African society.

Kwanza, translated as "first" in Kiswahili, represents the celebration of the first harvest, the labor for the harvest and the growth of the seeds planted.

And then there's Christmas. Father Joseph Quigley of the Newman Center at UMass said of Christmas, "This is a major holiday in the Christian church. It's the day that, in the Christian belief, God became a man in Jesus Christ."

Before the birth of Christ, "Man turned from God and a restoration had to take place," Quigley said. "The coming (of Jesus) was going to restore man in God's friendship."

Northampton shelter offers holiday cheer for homeless

By RITA MURPHY
Collegian Staff

It's cold this evening in Northampton. The pace on Main St. is quick. Hoards of holiday shoppers carrying packages stroll past Thornes Market. A bus stops, bodies pile into it, and it leaves. The shoppers are gone. The sky darkens. On the corner of King and Main street sits a lone figure, rummaging through a bag.

"I like Mondays. I find a lot of things. Look, a hat. Nice isn't it. Home, not gonna go home. This is o.k. It's cold though.

"You go to school. I like UMass too. Sometimes I take the bus. I like the room with all the games. It's fun. It's warm."

His name, he says, is Ted, and he is just one of hundreds who find themselves homeless in this area.

One place in Northampton that is trying to help the homeless is Jessie House, the area's only emergency shelter for those without a roof over their head.

Jessie House provides shelter for up to 25 people per day, but because of limited space has to turn away from 80 to 100 people a month. Last month alone, the house had to turn away 57 families, 25 men, 10 women and four couples without children, according to Priella White, director of Jessie House.

"It's hard to turn them away, but if we're full, and we usually are, there isn't much we can do. We try to call other shelters, but there are those we just can't find help for," White said.

The nearest shelter is in Holyoke, she said.

John Sheehan, executive director of the United Way in Northampton, said the problem of the homeless is "a huge one which is getting worse instead of getting better.

"The rents downtown (Northampton) have quadrupled in the past few years. Low income families just can't afford to pay them. They're out in the streets. (The United Way) is helping more people now than ever, but there are a lot more people to help than ever before.

Sheehan has been with the United Way for 12 years and said the past three have been the most difficult that he has seen in this area in dealing with the homeless.

"Poverty in this area is invisible. Most people don't think it exists. But it does. It's definitely gotten worse over the last four years and with the proposed (Reagan Administration's) budget cuts, well, it doesn't look good. Nationwide, the United Way has raised less than $2 billion over the last three years while the federal government has cut $35 billion from the budget. It's hard everywhere, including here," he said.

In Amherst there is no shelter to house the homeless, but the Amherst Survival Center does provide food and clothing for the needy in the area.

Evangeline Westcott, director of the center, said there is "a growing number of young people between the ages of 18 and 24 who may or may not have had problems with alcohol and drugs but just can't get their life together. They've given up."

Not everyone who passes through the center is homeless, some are, some have homes but no food, and some have food but no clothing, Westcott said. Last December over 2000 people passed through the center, most seeking warmth and food, she said.

Want to buy Trivial Pursuit, computers? Cabbage Patch dolls (ha!) You're too late Consensus has it that the hottest holiday gift items include Cabbage Patch dolls again, video cassette recorders and the board game Trivial Pursuit. Consensus also has it that if consumers still want to buy these items in time for Chanukkah or Christmas, they ought to think again.

Empty shelves meant for displaying gifts in demand prove that eager consumers with fat wallets are willing to spend their very last dollar this season. Economists say the economy is better and marketers are capitalizing on that advantage.

Jim Copen, customer relations manager at K Mart in the Hampshire Mall, said, "Business is better than last year and some of the empty shelves are definitely showing that."

"Demand is certainly out-doing the supply," he said.

Copen said K Mart has been out of Cabbage Patch dolls, Alphie 2, a computer that asks and gives questions and Transformer, a toy that changes from a robot to a car, for three weeks. He does not expect any more shipments before the holidays.

Books for the mind and the table

By BRADFORD J. MICHAEL VERTER AND HIS LITTLE HELPERS

Writer Lenore Hershey said, "do give books---religious or otherwise--- for (the holidays). They're never fattening, seldom sinful, and permanently personal." The remarkable array of books published this year makes this an especially good season to follow her advice

Foremost among the fine fiction is Swallow, by D. M. Thomas (Viking $16.95). An extrapolation of his earlier book Ararat, Swallow is enigmatic, shocking, and at times erotic, and always funny.

In a similar vein is Thomas McGuane's The Bushwacked Piano (Vintage, $5.95), a yuck-a-minute chroniele of a madman's trek from Detroit to Florida. He encounters an oddball assortment of characters ranging from spoiled rich girls to artistic, hyperchondriac peripelics, all with delusions of grandeur. Random House has also published McGuane's book, Something to be Desired.

Grandeur and delusion play a large part in Ashby, by Maurice Valency (Schocken $15.95), an entertaining fictitious biography of a New York artist during the Depression. Tom Robbins has released his fourth book, Jitterbug Perfume, a wild fantasy of a janitor who has found a bottle which contains what very well may be " the secret essence of the universe". And Michael Tournier has a fascinating selection of short stories in his collection, The Fetishist (Doubleday $13.95)

Poetry in a speculative vein has been collected in Robert Frazier's anthology Burning With a Vision: Poetry of Science and the Fantastic. Although of inconsistent quality, it does contain some fine work by Brian Aldiss, Michael Bishop, Roger Zelazny and many lesser-known authors. Ursula LeGuin contributed a few low-caliber verses not much better that those collected in her terrible Hard Words. Frazier has balanced these with some gems by the ever-erudite Thomas Disch. Burning With a Vision is available for $14.75 ($8.75 paper) from Owiswick Press. Box 8243 Philadelphia, PA 19101.

Philip Jose Farmer, who is among the featured poets in Burning With a Vision, is one of the featured authors in Fantastic Lives: Autobiographical Essays by Notable Science Fiction Writers, edited by Martin H. Greenberg (Southern Illinois University Press, $15.00). Interesting and insightful, Fantastic Lives offers articles by such visionaries as Harlan Ellison, Barry Malzberg, A.E. Van Vogt and R.A. Lafferty

Science fiction writers are not the only artists who have graced us with autobiographies this year. The great Georges Simenon has printed his Intimate Memoirs (Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, $22.95), detailing his life from his numerous sexual liasons to the unfortunate suicide of his daughter, Marie-Jo. Heinrich Boll's short book, What's To Become of the Boy (Knopf, $11.95) tells of his youth during Hitler's reign. The reader is left to determine how his experience affected his subsequent books, such as The Lost Honor of Katarina Blum.

Another witty collection is Stanislaw Lem's Imaginary Magnitude (Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, $15.95). A sort of sequel to A Perfect Vacuum (reviews of nonexistent books), Imaginary Magnitude has introduction and forwards to imaginary books. Bill Cardoso's gathering of articles, The Maltese Sangweech & Other Heroes (Atheneum, $15.95) is humorous and illuminating. Hunter S. Thompson has said of Cardoso "I'd forgotten how much pure fun and pleasure it is to read the bastard."

More serious is A.W. Brian Simpson's Cannabalism and the Common Law: The Story of the Tragic Last Voyage of the Mignonette and the Strange Legal Proceedings to Which it Gave Rise (University of Chicago Press, $25.00). A fascinating study of legal history, it details the prosecution of three men, adrift after being shipwrecked, who had sacrificed a boy for food. Simpson examines the ramifications of survivalistic cannibalism, while at the same time painting an evocative picture of the time.

Laurie Anderson's United States: pertinent and hilarious

Recommended for those with a morbid scholarly bent.

Arthur C. Clarke's Ascent to Orbit (John Wiley & Sons. $19.95), while packaged as a coffee table book, is a collection of his scientific papers. Published by the people who print your textbooks, these are the writings which led to Clarke winning the 1982 Marconi award. What for? He designed those satellites that make syndicated TV possible. Gawd bless him!

Although not quite a song book, United States by Laurie Anderson (Harper/Colophon, $29.92, $19.95 paper) has been released. The visual accompaniment to her eight-hour performanee work, the book stands on its own. The text is both pertinent and hilarious: "Her boyfriend was never in a bad mood he was in a bad mode. Modey kind of guy. The romance was kind of rocky and she kept saying: 'Man oh man like it's so digital. She just meant that the relationship was on again, off again." Great book, great pictures; a must to entertain the relatives.

Perhaps the best of the photo books this year is Diane Arbus: Magazine Work (Aperure, $35.00). Filled with haunting, lonely photographs that did not appear in her earlier monograph, the book features works commissioned for periodicals.

The problem with giving books as holiday gifts is that their size and weight betray them, also the fact that they don't rattle when shaken. Neverthless, the delight in receiving a good book greatly dismisses any disappointment in knowing what one's present is.

2010: The sequel to the legend

By COUNT RAMIN ZAHED
Collegian Staff

Two weeks ago, the stars and director of the movie 2010 met with members of the college press in Los Angeles to talk about the making of the film. What follows is a brief summary of what was discussed.

Peter Hyams, the courageous man who dared to direct a sequel to the Kubrick classic appeared to be a bit tired of comparisons made between him and the old master. He said although he was originally "scared stiff" of the intensity of the project, 2010 turned out to be a very emotional and personal film for him.

Hyams' who has already dealt with outer space in films like Capricorn One and Outland said, "Those previous works helped me get accustomed with the visual aspects; however, I didn't want the effects to dominate the human element of the movie." He said he tried to get strong actors like Roy Scheider and John Lithgow to give a warm feeling to a film that is technically superb. Hyams mentioned that he, himself, had been staring at the sky since he was a young boy. He said "I tried to make a movie that would make teenagers think about our world." Hyams noted that working with author Arthur C. Clarke was simply wonderful.

Keir Dullea, the original survivor of 2001, also appears in the sequel

Clarke, who is one of the best known and most admired authors of science fiction, seemed to be very pleased with the film adaptation of his latest novel. He said the politics involved in the movie are very prophetic considering the fact that they were written more than a year ago. When asked about the difference between 2010 and its sequel, the brilliant scientist smiled and said, "2010 is certainly more emotional; Stanley (Kubrick) will be jealous."

Roy Scheider's strong portrayal of Dr. Heywood Floyd is one of 2010's main attractions. Displaying a healthy tan and sunglasses, Scheider also radiated with satisfaction about the completion of the project. Scheider mentioned that his character is basically the one viewers see the movie through. He said in contrast to 2001 which "left so much in the air", this film is much more communicative.

Along with the computer H.A.L., Keir Dullea, who plays Commander David Bowman, is the only member of the cast of 2001 who also appears in the sequel. Dullea, whose portrayal of Bowman plays an important part in both movies, is another lesson in optimism. He said he loved the film for what it had to say to the superpowers. Dullea said, "I think the idea of putting three rather unstable people in outer space was good because science fiction needs humor." He also found his reunion with H.A.L. extremely moving.

It is refreshing to see so much good will associated with a science fiction film released in 1984. All this simplistic idealism would definitely put a smile on George Orwell's face.

"I feel pretty fortunate to have been in some landmark films. I really can not say which director I like working with best. It is like trying to choose your favorite artist. You can't really choose between Velazquez and Rembrandt. They all have their own special characteristics. Kubrick and Spielberg are both technically astute, and I really enjoyed working with Fosse. Collaborating with Meryl Streep in Still of the Night was also a great experience. I really don't have anything specific in mind for the future. I wouldn't mind playing a villain for a change, and I would always welcome something like All That Jazz."
—Roy Scheider

General Public: bopping music

GENERAL PUBLIC
in the Student Union Ballroom
Sunday, December 9

By MARY CRESSE
Collegian Staff

Probably the worst thing, the absolute worst thing, would be if some diphead deejay tries to make General Public Top Forty; they are simply too good for Kasey Kasem's inane, scratchy observations; but with the punchy pop sound of their debut album, All The Rage, and their danceable, ballad-like single "Tenderness," I can hear the jerk now:

"And wouldn't you know it, there are two members from what hit band who slept in a car for three weeks stumbling from door to door trying to get what new album released? What hit band now, has made themselves a hit single with the song "Tenderness?" Why, it's the English Beat's Ranking Roger and Daaaaaavid Wakeling..." Oh, shut up, Kasey...

David Wakeling of General Public made them dance in the SUB Sunday night.

Now the part about the car isn't true, but everything else is: Wakeling and Roger have imported Mickey Billingham from Dexy's Midnight Runners to play keyboards, and Horace Panter came in to provide the Public's bubbling bass sounds; Stoker from the Specials is here, too.

What does it sound like? Well I don't like to use the word 'pop', because you then get everything from The Carpenters to Wham, and God knows, we don't want that. I can't, in respect to Bob Marley, say reggae, though if GP had to be classified as anything it would have to be reggae, kind of...And I don't like to say rock either, because they're just not. If you can just imagine a little funky jazz fusion thrown in with a little reggae and enough pop to bop to, you're all set. And you should be sorry if you missed Sunday night's UPC show at the Studnt Union Ballroom.

So why then, am I not mentioning the fact that I bopped to death at the SUB on Sunday night? Because, if all goes well, you should be reading this on Wednesday, and that, to me, is too late for a concert review. Why? Hell, I don't know, it has something to do with ads and what not, but please, if you liked the Beat, go out and buy All The Rage.

GP's strongest songs were "Tenderness"-- it's got Beat-like unrequited-love lyrics but a pop sound: "I don't know where I am, but I don't like it..." "Are You Leading Me On" is slow, with a rock beat, but goes quickly into mellow, quick reggae, then slips back into rock. Never heard that before. "As A Matter Of Fact" was a surprise crowd pleaser, with Ranking Roger pounding on his drums and running about the stage.

The album sounds good, but so-so compared to them in person, and how many bands can you describe like that?

Now, one last word for UPC: you put on good shows, people, but pa-leeze give your security people Valium or something, huh? I always feel like I'm going through Turkish customs.

Fantasy and fun in Shakespeare

A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM
December 12-15
Rand Theatre, UMass

By LORENA NOZZOLILLO
Collegian Correspondent

A Midsummer Night's Dream, Shakespeare's play of unrequited love and supernatural mischief, has been successfully brought to life by the UMass Theatre Department. Director Lisa Kornetsky's play is a colorful, lively production, which features an energetic cast, beautiful costumes, and a fantastic set.

Scenic Designer Paul Gorfine's main set, a magical forest where most of the play's action takes place, is beautifully crafted and sets the mood for this enchanted comedy. A large moon illuminates the stage, giving a surrealistic effect to the play.

The residents of this forest are the fairies. The queen of these fairies is Titania, and the King is known as Oberon.

The comedy begins when two groups of mortals stumble into the forest, and fall prey to the fairies' mischief.

The first mortals we see entering the forest are four young lovers from Athens. Two of the young lovers, Lysander and Hermia, are in love with each other but cannot marry. Egeus, Hermia's father, wishes her to marry Demetrius, another young man from Athens. While Hermia turns her nose at Demetrius, Helena, her awkward friend, would gladly have him. So, to escape her father's rule, Hermia and Lysander escape into the woods, closely followed by Demetrius and Helena. Another group of mortals, a gypsy acting troupe, also enter the forest at this time. This is where the fun begins.

Little known to the young lovers or the actors, the King and the Queen of this forest are in the middle of a feud over a servant boy. Also unknown to them, is that they will all fall prey to the hijinks of a fairy called Puck.

Before the night is over, Puck, with the aid of a love potion, creates havoc among the young lovers, when he makes the mistake as to who should be in love with who. For example, instead of making Demetrius fall for Helena (as his master, Oberon instructed him to do) he makes Lysander fall in love with Helena, leaving Hermia hurt and confused.

Not even Titania, Queen of the fairies, can escape the supernatural tricks of Oberon and Puck. By using his love potion, Oberon causes Titania to fall in love with Bottom, a player from the acting troupe. This would be demeaning enough, but through his magic, Puck has given Bottom an ass's head.

But all's well that ends well (no pun intended) and the lovers are joined with the mate of their choice (i.e. Lysander with Hermia, Demetrius with Helena), Bottom is returned to normal, and peace is made with Oberon and Titania.

Although most of Shakespeare's comedies would succeed in making the audience chuckle, thanks to the comedic talents of the cast, the audience at the Rand was practically rolling in the aisles.

Rick O'Neill was usually the clown of the show in UMass productions of the past. This time O'Neill plays Peter Quince (the leader of the acting troupe) whose wit is far more subtle. The clowns are played by David Todd as Bottom, and Oliver Wadsworth as Puck.

Todd is a gifted comedic actor who is hysterical as the ham actor Nick Bottom. Wadsworth moves on the stage with the grace of a cat, and is just as sneaky and playful. Other members of the cast worth mentioning are Letitia Ord as the rejected Helena, and Lawrence Devine, who plays Demetrius with an air of statley elegance. Also remarkable were all the actors in the misfit acting troupe, who gave an hilarious production of a play called "Thisbe and Pyramus".

A Midsummer Night's Dream is a play filled with merriment and fantasy. It's the Theatre Department's holiday gift to the university, so by all means indulge.

UMass falls to BU in triple OT

Minutemen blow 15 point lead in struggle with Terriers, go to 2-3

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD--Senior Shawn Teague scored four points in the third overtime to give Boston University a 71-70 victory over the University of Massachusetts last night at the Springfield Civic Center.

Teague hit a layup with 2:32 left in the game to give the Terriers a 69-68 lead after UMass guard Darryl Carter missed the second of two free throws. Carl Smith then turned the ball over to BU's Dwayne Vinson with 0:39 seconds to go.

The Minutemen waited until 0:07 before fouling Teague. The 6'2 guard calmly hit both shots before Carter hit a jumper with one second left for the final margin.

BU, 2-4, cut a 15 point second half UMass lead, 51-36 with 7:10 to go, to tie the game at 57-57 on a Jim Christian 22 footer with five seconds left in regulation. Christian scored 10 of BU's 16 points in the final five minutes of regulation.

In the first overtime, the teams traded points before Smith missed a desperation jumper with two seconds left and the score remained tied at 61-61.

In the second overtime, the teams came away tied at 65 as Christian missed a last second jumper. UMass had built a four point lead, 65-61. But BU's Teague and Paul Hendricks each scored to tie the game.

UMass was again cold from the foul line going 24 of 38 (63 percent). They missed four of seven in the final five minutes of regulation, including three one-and-ones.

For UMass, 2-3 and losers of three straight, Donald Russell had 27 points, Bobby Braun had 17 with Horace Neysmith adding 16 points.

"The team is very upset with this loss," UMass coach Ron Gerlufsen said. "I felt we outplayed BU but for some reason we missed foul shots in regulation that could have won it."

In the first half, the Minutemen took a 26-22 lead on 12 points from Neysmith and eight points from Russell.

UMass sprinted out to a 8-0 advantage with Russell getting the first six points before Neysmith added a layup. The Minutemen extended its lead to 13-6 as Smith beat the BU press and found Neysmith for an easy layup, with 13:12 to go.

The Minutemen threw a variety of zone defenses on the Terriers and succeeded in holding high scoring forward Hendricks to just six points. The Minutemen caused seven BU turnovers as Neysmith and Smith had two steals each.

BU cut the UMass lead to one, 21-20, before Neysmith completed a three point play with 2:32 to go. The teams exchanged turnovers before UMass went into a short delay that ended with a Lorenzo Sutton miss.

The Terriers' Jim Christian was short on a jumper before Smith hit his only shot of the half, a 17 footer that gave UMass a four point lead at the half. UMass never trailed in the first half.

UMass shot 46 percent from the floor for the game as did BU, the Terriers were 9 of 10 from the line.

MINUTMAN MUTTERINGS: Before last night's game, Braun was shooting a team-high 58 percent from the floor at 14-of-24, the 6-6 forward was worse from the line at 30 percent

Bol and Leiberman, the tall and the short of it

By DAN LEBERFELD
Collegian Staff

The sport of sports, college basketball, is once again in season. Let's delve into the hoop cornacopia and pull out some fruits of intrigue.

A 7-6, 190 pound Sudanese young man has put the city of Bridgeport, Conn. back on the map. His name is Manute Bol and he is the center for the University of Bridgeport basketball team. Believe it or not this 22 year old freshman is not the tallest hoopster in college basketball history, that lofty distinction belongs to 7-8 George Bell who payed for Biola College in California a few years back. Last seen he was with the Harlem wizards, a Globetrotter type team.

On the other end of the spectrum the shortest player in college basketball is 5-2½ Zach Lieberman who starts for Division 1 U.S. International in San Diego. He barely wins the battle for diminutive domination in the hoop world over Wake Forest's 5-3 Tyrone "Mugsy" Bogues.

A player to watch this year is Hofstra (NY) University's 6-8 freshman Willie Brown, who before it's over should be revered as the best deaf basketball player in history.

Clemson University is a school destined to be involved in college sport illegarities. For the second consecutive year the Tiger's basketball coach Cliff Ellis has scoffed up a recruit who committed to another school. Last season Anthony Blackman of Buffalo, NY verbally committed to Canisius before Ellis convinced him otherwise. This season Jacksonville received a commitment from Jerry Pryor of Georgia before Ellis changed his mind. The Tiger's host a tournament every season known as the IP-TAY Classic. IPTAY stands for "I pay ten dollars a year," in honor of contributors to the program. Down south, somebody sarcastically changed the meaning of IPTAY to, "it's probation time again y'all."

Despite the loss of two main cogs in their program 6-6 Tim Dawson and 6-5 Bernard Woodside, George Washington will win the Atlantic Ten behind Brown and high school teammate 6-4 guard Troy Webster. Look for Georgia Tech to surprise everyone and win the national championship, they have the horses.

Minuteman swimmers look for victory against Springfield

By NANCY A. BUKAR

The University of Massachusetts men's swim team faces a tough opponent when they travel to Springfield College tomorrow night at 7 p.m.

Springfield is one of the top four teams in New England and "they destroyed us last year," coach Russ Yarworth said. UMass goes into this meet with a 1-1 record after a close loss to Tufts last week.

Yarworth is facing some additional problems this time around because of sickness. Tri-captain and distance swimmer Paul McNeil is out with the flu, distance swimmer Rick Bishop has a sore shoulder, Steven King is "just coming back" after a bout with mono and two other swimmers have academic committments.

"We're a little weakened," Yarworth said, "but we're going to try and win if we can.

"I don't really have a good idea of how we're going to swim because of illness and injuries," Yarworth said. He added that some personal records might be broken at the meet even with the absences.

"It's (Springfield) a jock school and they've got Larry Jordan, who is excellent. He's at the caliber of Craig (Fuller)," Yarworth said, referring to the junior transfer from Iowa who has already broken one school record in the 200-yard butterfly.

After Springfield, the final meet of the fall semester, the team will travel to Pompano Beach, Florida for a week during intersession for 10 days of intensive workouts.

Pollution penalties bill may cost University

By BOB BURGESS
and IAN POLUMBAUM
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts may be fined up to $10,000 for each day its heating plant violates the Clean Air Act if a pollution penalties bill passes in the Massachusetts House of Representatives today.

The bill, sponsored by the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (Mass PIRG), would authorize the Department of Environmental Quality to fine state pollution law violators $100 to $10,000 per day. According to the DEQE, UMass' heating plant violates the Clean Air Act by spewing about 300 tons of unburnt coal dust into the atmosphere every year.

At present DEQE files lawsuits against companies and municipalities it finds to be violating pollution laws. If the House of Representatives passes the penalties bill, DEQE will be able to fine violators without taking them to court.

Since 1981, UMass has overrun three DEQE deadlines for complying with the act. The last compliance schedule expired last July.

Construction of a "bag-house" exhaust filtration system adjoining the power plant began in 1981. Physical Plant Operations supervisor Peter Wozniak said last week that "operational and engineering problems" continue to delay the bag-house's completion.

Williard Pope, general counsel for the DEQE, said the term "violators," which is not specifically defined in the bill as it is written now, would be interpreted to include state universities--as well as individuals, municipalities and corporations--unless specific exemptions are made.

The pollution penalties bill was passed unanimously by the state senate Tuesday night. Mass PIRG staff member Jonathan Landman, who works in the Boston office, said yesterday that Mass PIRG has all but one sponsor needed for the bill to pass in the House today.

Landman also said amendments which would have "weakened" the bill, and DEQE's authority to assess fines, were not passed.

The bill states that DEQE must notify the suspected violators unless the violation falls into one of four categories:

--conscious negligence
--part of a noncompliance pattern
--failure to report disposal of hazardous materials to DEQE

UMass students worked last week to get citizen support for the bill. According to Mass PIRG member Theresa Dawson, over 200 people agreed to send postcards to legislators urging them to "step illegal pollution" and sign the pollution penalties bill.

Irish writers lack support

Author explains difficulties of profession

By LAURA KOESTER
Collegian Staff

A "profound fear of exposure" and "obsession with self-protection" are the main reasons Irish Catholics are unsupportive of writers according to author Mary Gordon, who spoke to an audience of 100 last night in the Campus Center.

Gordon, an Irish-American and a former professor at Amherst College, is the seventh and final speaker in a series called, "Writer's Speak: America and the Ethnic Experience". She is the author of two books: Final Payment and The Company of Women.

Gordon, in addressing the question of why there are so few Irish authors, spoke of the reaction of her family to her writing. "As far as their support for me as a writer, I have nothing positive to say. There was no confidence given to me. My family was embarassed. They regard me as a lost soul," she said.

The explicit sexual content of Gordon's novels drew the stern disapproval of her Catholic family. "One of my uncles told me he couldn't stand my first book and would not waste his money buying the second." She said her cousin, who is a nun, told her that her books were "dreadful" and confided to another family member "the publishers made her put sex in those books."

Gordon emphasized that although a writer "is the citizen of a larger world" it would be a grave error to renounce the bonds of the ethnic community. "The Irish are a very interesting people. Their lives are marked by paradox, which is rich material for any writer. You feel like you're breaking into private treasures," she said.

Gordon noted that Irish parties usually end in fights because "they're always trying to defend the indefendable, like the virginity of Mary and the CIA. But they have a vision of the ideal. The feel the human condition starkly, they feel it in their bones. The world is sacred to them."

Gordon said the writer is particularly threatening to the Irish community because a writer reveals, "putting oneself and the people one loves in danger." She spoke of the long history of colonization and oppression in Ireland and of the discrimination faced by the Irish immigrant in this country. "The Irish faced double linguistic colonization by the English and by the Catholic Church, who used Latin," she said.

She said although the Irish maintained a strong cultural identity, "they were seperated from a rich body of Irish poetry.

Gordon compared the situation of the Irish immigrant to that of the Jewish immigrant and the black slave. "Blacks have expressed their pain in the poetry of spirituals and the blues and Jews have put a lot of cultural weight on academics and writing." The Irish, by contrast, have expressed themselves mainly in popular journalism and political speeches, according to Gordon.

Gordon attributed this to "deep-rooted localism" and the "parish as world mentality" symbolized by the local politician and Irish cop. "Before the Kennedys, the political success of the Irish was always local, and depended upon a large Irish population, a sort of extended neighborhood or parish."

Swing space negotiations approved by Senate

By BOB BURGESS
Collegian Staff

Negotiations with administrators to redesign emergency on-campus housing policies and $18,555 in student group allocations were approved last night by the Undergraduate Student Senate.

Meeting for the final time this semester, the senators unanimously approved "immediate negotiations" with University of Massachusetts housing officials to redesign "swing spaces," which are temporarily used to house students oeft without rooms at the beginning of a semester.

Brown House senator Stacy Roth, sponsor of the motion, said she is "treating the swing space issue as an academic one," because university policy uses dormitory music rooms, lounges and study rooms as swing spaces. Roth said study areas in dorms have been greatly reduced by emergency housing policies.

Roth told senators she is working on a four-part proposal which she hopes to bring to housing officials before the April room choosing period. The proposal includes:

--renovating former residential buildings which now serve as administrative offices, like Arnold House in Central Residential Area
--sophomore exemption from on-campus living
--renovating the houses of fraternities which want to relocate into Fraternity/Soroity Park as dormitories.

"The purpose of this motion," Roth said, "is to present the administration with proposals for the entire student body. Some administrators don't even admit there is a study space problem."

Senators also approved the largest number of student group allocations of the semester, and $3500 for new carpets in the Credit Union and the recently relocated Off-Campus Housing Office in the Student Union Building. Senators refused to spend $2700 to carpet the senate offices.

Protests lack Mass.students

Apartheid demonstrations hurt by apathy

BOSTON (AP) - Unlike protests of two previous decades in Massachusetts, students have shied away while professors and politicians have taken to the front lines of demonstrations against apartheid policies in South Africa.

"I think that it's all part of this student generation, that with notable exception, students have decided to concentrate on 'making it,' " Harvard biology professor George Wald said.

More than 100 people have been taken into custody during demonstrations in a dozen cities around the country, including 15 congressmen arrested in marches at the South African Embassy in Washington.

Students have rallied at campuses across the country, but not in Massachusetts. None of those arrested in Boston demonstrations were students, and there were no protests at Harvard University, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology or Amherst College, officials said.

"If there have been any, I'm not aware of them," Jeanne Hopkins Stover said from the University of Massachusetts news office in Amherst.

"It probably has to do with this being the end of the semester," Hampshire College publicist Russell Powell said. "Everybody's cranking out work."

While students study, such professors as Willard R. Johnson and George Wald are carrying on the long battle against apartheid.

"I'm frustrated, but...real objectives require a long haul effort," Johnson said, noting that after years of haranguing by anti-apartheid groups, Yale recently decided to sell stock in American companies that refused to sign an agreement to practice non-discrimination.

"I believe you will see Harvard and MIT joining those ranks," Johnson said.

Wald doesn't agree. "The guiding principle at universities such as this is never to irritate the government and never to irritate corporate structures. The bottom line, as one Harvard administrator says, is money," he said.

College officials say that ridding themselves of South African-linked stocks is far from simple.

Faculty at Amherst College studied the question for six months before deciding "it was impossible to divest," news director Terry Allen said.

NOBEL PEACE PRIZE WINNER Desmond Tutu has crystallized U.S. opposition to the apartheid system in South Africa by his appearances in this country and abroad.

U.S. cities, colleges gradually divesting

(AP) - Nearly a dozen U.S. cities are following the example of colleges and universities which are protesting South Africa's racial policies by dumping millions of dollars in stocks of firms doing business in the country.

Anti-apartheid college protests and investment boycotts have gone on for years. The University of Wisconsin, for example, hasn't owned stocks in such companies since 1978.

But renewed student protests, the awarding of the Nobel Peace Prize to Bishop Desmond Tutu and concern over political prisoners in South Africa have spurred more universities to reevaluate investment policies.

Cornell University and the University of Illinois are among schools studying what divestment of stocks in companies with South African dealings would mean to their portfolios.

Stanford University is considering whether to act on an Oct. 31 student referendum urging it to sell $3.2 million worth of Motorola Corp. stock because of that company's sales to South African militia and police.

And regents of the University of Texas, which has about $600 million invested in such companies, are scheduled to discuss the issue Thursday and Friday. Texas students rallied twice this year to protest their school's holdings.

Now cities and municipal pension funds with multi-million dollar portfolios have joined schools in adopting or considering similar investment policies.

According to the Washington Office on Africa an anti-apartheid lobby, 11 cities have recently adopted policies to divest some or all of their holdings in companies with South African operations including Boston and Amherst.

Last July, Boston passed an ordinance giving the city three years to withdraw funds from banks with South African ties, and to sell off pension fund stocks of companies doing business in South Africa. The city has about $300 million on deposit in the banks.

Some schools have sold off all investments in companies dealing with South Africa. Besides Wisconsin, the City University of New York agreed last September to divest itself of all such stock, worth about $9 million.

Last Friday, about 30 University of Missouri-St. Louis students protested the school's investment policies. The university changed its policies in October by urging that funds be invested only in companies not doing business in South Africa, but stopped short of calling for divestiture.

Relief available from pressure

By KENNETH B. ALBERT
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts has several programs that help students cope with personal and academic problems, especially those experiencing academic pressure from upcoming final exams.

Rick Townes, assistant director of academic services said, "I don't know if the volume of people we see here changes at this time of year, but the nature of the problems people come in with is definitely different. During the semester, I get a little bit of every kind of problem, but in the last two or three weeks, we're almost always talking straight academics."

Townes said the problems are the worst for those students who have fallen behind in their work. "If the people don't stay on top of their work, then with finals plus the volume of work that has to get done...it often completely immobilizes them," he said.

The most common solution is just to find a way to get the student started catching up on heir work. "It's tough to get them stated, but if they do, then they usually stay started until they're done," Townes said.

Don Banks of the Student Sounseling Service said, "This time of year we usually have a significant increase in the number of students we see." He said this increase is directly related to end-of-term stress.

He said, "For students who have fallen so far behind that they don't know where to start, I try to help them make a realistic appraisal of the time they have left. We then try to get into a fairly rigid strueture of time schedule."

He said that for other students, however, the problem is not just having fallen behind. He said that these students problems may be motivated by fear or stress.

He said that there are some special cases where it becomes necessary to do some negotiations within the academic system to relieve some of the pressure from these students. He said that this may involve having the students agree to accept incompletes. Sometimes, he said, it is possible to get teachers to arrange alternate exams to ease a congested schedule.

Banks said, "Every case is different. I try to maintain a broad multi-dimensional approach. I have good relationships with most of the deans and with Mental Health, and in some cases it is necessary to utilize them."

Overview of General Ed.

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts history professor remembers a class he taught a few years ago. "There was a student in one of my classes who told me she didn't need to learn history," said the professor, "because it wouldn't help her in Fashion Marketing. She said to me, "What difference does it make whether or not I know that Hitler was dictator of the Russians?" The professor just rolled his eyes and smiled.

It was because of incidents like this one that professors began to question three years ago whether or not the present UMass core requirements gave students enough knowledge in the humanities and sciences.

"The difference between this proposal and the former one is the difference between the pragmatist versus the dreamer."

—General Ed Chairman Joel Naroff

The efforts of the University's Faculty Senate to come to grips with what is perceived as a nationwide problem will come to a head today when the Senate votes on a general education proposal that will apply to incoming freshmen in the Fall of 1986.

When an ad hoc committee on general education put forward a proposal to revise the core system 18 months ago, it was tabled by the Faculty Senate, and a general education counell was formed.

According to Joel Naroff, council chairman, the original proposal contained language that was "offensive."

"The proposal was a philosophical anathema," he said in an interview last week."

"A lot of people were making philosophical and political judgements on the proposed courses," he said. "It lacked reality."

Naroff said the proposal was also "severely criticized" for its "enormous resource distribution" which made it "impossible to implement." Naroff said, "We give a pholosophy behind every core" that is designated as a general education requirement, unlike the former one.

"The difference between this proposal and the former one is the difference between the pragmatist versus the dreamer," he said. Although the proposal has been revised to include "breadth of knowledge" as well as "depth of knowledge," it is not without flaws, Naroff said.

The faculty complain a shortage of teaching assistants exists and that these TA's are overworked and underpaid.

At the beginning of every semester, students cry that core requirement classes are oversubscribed and professors complain that their departments are overcrowded and understaffed. Some professors say that conditions of deteriorating buildings on campus and the lack of modern and efficient equipment, especially in laboratories, is dismal. At every other senate meeting, professors complain about budget allocations and claim they are being shafted from the University's priority list.

Yet the proposal calls for a TA for every 50 students in certain courses, a science with a laboratory class attached, a eut from 1,000 core courses to about 300, and ongoing yearly costs estimated at about $611,000, in addition to one time costs.

"No proposal is perfect," Naroff said "nor right for every person."

Barriers facing women topic of seminar

by MARIANE MEUSE
Collegian Correspondent

Overcoming the barriers facing women in the workplace is the focus of a two-day seminar to be offered during intersession by Valerie Young of the Professional Development Association.

The seminar is titled "Professional Development for Women". Young identified two types of barriers facing the working woman--internal and external. The seminar will examine how women convince themselves that they are not talented, that they are imposters, despite outward signs of success.

"Many women feel like imposters despite external evidence to the contrary, like good grades, positive feedback from faculty members and employers, degree, and other kinds of recognition," Young said.

The external barriers women face are those society places in front of women who are trying to achieve. Young said that although some progress has been made toward removing these barriers, the old messages of inferiority are still present.

"Girls growing up today are being given conflicting messages. They're being told you can be an astronaut, but when you come home after school don't leave the neighborhood." Young said.

"The emphasis is still on dependence, playing it safe, not taking risks, and being perfect,' she added.

Young will also discuss ways to overcome the external barriers. The seminar will give women "the opportunity to strategize about how to cope with different situations, like being interrupted in meetings by men or having your ideas trivialized."

Young said the psychological barriers can be broken down when women realize, through talking with other women, that they are not alone.

The seminar will be held January 19 and 20 from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., with an introductory meeting on January 9 from 7 to 9 p.m.

Several thefts, damaged cars on campus

A color TV, valued at $210, was reported stolen from the Malcolm X Center in the Southwest Residential Area at 4:43 p.m. Tuesday, police said.

Access was gained trhough a door, which was pried open at night.

An AM/FM cassette deck, valued at $185, was reported stolen from a room in the Lincoln Apartments at 1:59 p.m. Tuesday, police said.

According to police, some jewelry was also taken from the ransacked apartment, which was entered through an open window.

Police said a hit-and-run accident in lot 34 caused $100 in damage to a Volkswagen. The car was struck on the right front fender in an incident that was reported at 12:46 p.m. Tuesday.

Two jackets and some cash were reported stolen from the Franklin Dining Commons locker room at 3:17 p.m. Tuesday.

Police said that these thefts have been occurring for the last two weeks because the room is used by many students, and all storage spaces are without locks.

UMass College Bowl hosting tournament

Declaring their intention to regain the national championship, members of the UMass College Bowl academic quiz team today announced the first campus-wide intramural tournament in over ten years.

"We're looking for a few good show-offs," said senior history major Jay Flynn, one-year veteran of the quiz team. "We want students willing to make a minimal time commitment for some high pressure fun."

The intramural tournament, to be held Friday, Dec. 4'th in room 804 of the campus Center at 1:00 p.m., will pit as many four-person teams as possible in elimination rounds, with the four best players to be selected by vote to represent the University.

Women bus drivers face problems

By KATHY JORDAN
Collegian Staff

Man meets woman:

"What do you do at UMass besides going to school?"

"Well, I'm a bus driver."

"That's not very lady-like."

Passengers speaking to a female bus driver:

"I never thought a little thing like you could drive a big bus like this."

Or, "Oh! It's a lady bus driver!"

And, "Here's my number, call me sometime, I think you're cute."

Women who drive buses for the University of Massachusetts Transit Service (UMTS) hear these and similar comments because bus driving is traditionally considered a man's job.

But, "Women bus drivers in the past were considered pioneers, women drivers today just think of it (bus driving) as a job. Other women have gone before them, they are not breaking new ground," said Jenny Boyce, coordinator of Safety and Training at UMTS.

Boyce said one reason for so few female bus drivers is that when they see signs for driver training meetings, which are held at the beginning of each semester to hand out applications, females generally don't think the opportunity applies to them. They think "I could never do that because of either fear or the thought doesn't occur to them that it's a job they'd enjoy, according to Boyce.

UMTS advertises their training meetings with posters that specify, "Women encouraged to apply." These posters are hung in buses and on campus, particularly in the Everywoman's Center and the all female dorms.

UMTS trains bus drivers for a class two license and the applicants they learn how to drive a bus in an ight-week training program.

The process does not require physical strength or knowledge of engine mechanics. The only requirement is that a bus driver applicant has two remaining semesters at UMass and that they are taking six credits.

Female drivers have very successful careers at UMTS, she said. Women tend to move on to higher job positions such as radio operators and trainers, than men do, said Boyce.

Boyce said UMTS is a working climate where "people respect each other."

But some passengers hassle female drivers by calling them derogatory names such as "bitch." Boyce added that Amherst is generally an enlightened community and problems between the public and female drivers are few.

Framingham State College vows crackdown on fires

FRAMINGHAM, (AP) - Framingham fire officials have vowed a crackdown at Framingham State College to end a series of false alarms and trash fires that have plagued the campus over the past month.

"There is no more fooling around. We're playing hardball now," said Fire Chief John Hancock after firefighters spent Tuesday night responding to three separate fires and three false alarms at the college campus.

Nearly 1,000 students spent part of the night huddled in blankets outside their dormitories while firefighters checked the buildings.

"We fear going back in. We don't know if it's safe," said Patricia Gilgun, a junior living in Linsley Hall.

The Tuesday night incidents brought to 15 the number of false alarms at the college campus in the past month, according to Wendy Noyes, the school's vice president for Student Services.

Last winter, the University of Massachusetts campus at Amherst was plagued by almost nightly false alarms and small fires. A student was arrested and accused of setting fires, but the charges later were dropped.

In other business, the senate debated whether to give the Coordinating Committee, which serves as the out-of-session senate, the power to spend $1200 on emergency matters over intesession.

Southwest Area Government co-president Bill Collins had an amendment added to this proposal which called for a 2/3 vote needed for any expenditures by Coordinating Committee.

Collins said the committee "had shown great irresponsibility in the past" in spending money while the regular senate is not in session.

Senators finally approved the $1200, along with the required 2/3 vote. Previously, the 15-member coordinating committee needed only a majority vote for expenditure power.

Dining commons and other rooms open as study space

By JOHN YONCE
Collegian Staff

As the crunch of final exams approaches, alternative study areas are being made available to students around campus.

Worcester, Berkshire and Franklin Dining Commons will be open and serving free coffee and food from Sunday to Thursday nights, said Student Government Association co-President Rick Patrick.

"They (the dining commons) are a large, untapped resource," Patrick said.

Auxiliary Services and the SGA are largely responsible for making the space available, Patrick said. Auxiliary Services is donating the food, according to Patrick, and there will be student volunteers at all study areas.

Franklin is the only dining common that hasn't been opened during finals before, Patrick said. He said he had to convince building operations to allow it to open because "they feel it's their nicest D.C. and hard for security."

The Campus Center Board of Governers is making some conference and meeting rooms available, board member Alex Zucker said. "There will always be at least three or five rooms open during the week," he said. The list of rooms open will be posted at the information desk across from the Campus Center elevators, he said.

Patrick said that he is attempting to get money for the dining common study spaces allotted in university budgets each year.

"If enough people utilize this service, this can be institutionalized and offered every year at this time," he said.

Franklin and Basics food service in Worcester will be open to students with a valid UMass ID from 8-12 p.m., December 16th-20th, and Berkshire will be open from 8 p.m. to 12:30 a.m. on the same dates.

Shultz wary of talks

BRUSSELS (AP) - Secretary of State George P. Shultz said Wednesday he doubts the Soviet Union is changing its hostile attitude toward the West and cautioned against expecting a "big breakthrough" when he meets with the Soviet foreign minister next month.

"While the Soviet decision to enter into new arms control negotiations is welcome, the road ahead will not be easy and Western patience and realism will remain the key to concrete progress in the coming months," Shultz said in a statement upon arrival in Brussels.

Shultz is in Brussels for the two day biannual meeting of the NATO foreign ministers, which begins Thursday. He plans to meet Jan.7 and 8 in Geneva with Andrei A. Gromyko, the Soviet foreign minister.

Shultz said he expects there will be a discussion in Brussels of international terrorism, and he expects that the final communique will mention the problem.

Of the hijacking of a Kuwaiti airliner to Iran last week, in which two U.S. officials were killed by the hijackers, Shultz said, "I think Iran was conceptually wrong in their apparent willingness to advocate the cause of the terrorists."

First-class rate up

WASHINGTON (AP) - The cost of mailing a first-class letter will jump from 20 cents to 22 cents on Feb. 17, the U.S. Postal Service announced Wednesday.

Higher rates for nearly all classes of mail come just over three years after the last increase. Among other changes, mailing a post card will cost 14 cents instead of 13 cents, parcel post rates will rise 11 percent and second class mail, for newspapers and magazines, will cost 14 percent more.

The new rates were approved by the Postal Service's board of governors in the face of mounting red ink and despite uncertainty over future expenses caused by ongoing contract negotiations with postal unions. Salaries are by far the agency's biggest expense.

Profits reported by the Postal Service after the last rate hike in November 1981 led to some criticism, but officials said the profit would slowly disappear as expenses rose. That has occurred and in a recent three month period, the agency had a $240.6 million loss.

Military "must" cut

WASHINGTON (AP) - As President Reagan sought to meet his deficit-reducing goals, Treasury Secretary Donald T. Regan declared Wednesday that the military must accept its share of budget cuts next year, or else "I don't think our cuts have a prayer" in Congress.

Regan told reporters that defending the economy is as important as defending the country militarily, "and with these huge deficits we could be in danger of losing our economy."

Taking inflation into account, the rate of increase in military spending has averaged 14 percent per year, Regan said, for an increase of more than $1 trillion over five years.

Regan said slowing down the growth in defense spending would not cause irreparable harm to the United States' ability to defend itself.

"From an economic point of view, the economy of the country, in my judgment, is almost as important as our defense against outside enemies, and with these huge deficits we could be in danger of losing our economy."

Holiday sales slow in first two weeks

(AP) - The first two weeks of holiday sales fell below expectations, but big promotions and this year's extra weekend of shopping should turn around the retailers' most important season, analysts said Wednesday.

"The season really started off soft. Sales slowed very markedly right after Thanksgiving weekend," said Monroe Greenstein, a retail analyst with the investment firm Bear, Stearns & Co. in New York.

"There is an early sense, and it is early, that business may have picked up this past weekend and we may be into a stronger sales pattern for the balance of the Christmas season," he said.

"Many department stores and mass-merchandising companies have seen for the first two weeks overall volume increases essentially flat year to year," said Jeffrey Feiner, an analyst with the investment firm Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith Inc.

But Spiegel Inc., a merchant that sells only by catalog, says its Christmas sales are up 18 percent over a year ago. And Avon Products Inc. says its apparel catalogs also are pulling in double-digit sales gains.

The Christmas selling period accounts for 18 percent of retailers' annual revenues, and fourth-quarter profits account for 50 percent to 60 percent of their yearly earnings, said Jeffrey Edelman, an analyst with Dean Witter Reynolds Inc. in New York. He warned that this year's profits will be squeezed by widespread sales promotions.

Sears, Roebuck & Co., the nation's biggest retailer, declined to release figures for the first two weeks of the holiday season. But spokeswoman Kathy Guefa said, "We are continuing to expect strenthening sales in the remaining days before Christmas."

Ms. Guefa said customers have been shopping late in the past few years and that the Chicago-based retailer expects that to happen again.

Greenstein said he expects that, too.

"The calendar this year is ideal for a late Christmas season in that we have two extra shopping days before Christmas," which falls on a Tuesday, he said. "This year there are five weekends between Thanksgiving and Christmas. Last year, there were four. That is a major point."

And with more sales this Christmas season than in recent years, "the additional two days provide the consumer with the luxury of waiting for even further potential price breaks," Feiner added.

The items that are selling well include video cassette recorders, especially those with stereo sound' telephones' microwave ovens; board games; Rainbow Brite dolls; GoBot robotic toys; sleepwear for men, women and children; and other clothing.

IMPORTANT HOUSING INFORMATION

Reminder Notice

It is important for all students planning to live in the residence halls for the Spring 1985 semester to remember the following important policies. Please read this information carefully and be sure you understand and are aware of each of the following obligations.

1. SPRING SEMESTER BILLS ARE DUE JANUARY 3, 1985. As always, financial obligations must be met by all students who wish to retain their assignments for the upcoming semester. Failure to clear your bill by the indicated date will immediately cancel your housing assignment for the Spring. If you lose your assignment for failing to pay your bill, YOU WILL BE REQUIRED TO REMOVE YOUR BELONGINGS FROM YOUR ROOM DURING INTERSESSION, prior to the beginning of the Spring Semester.

2. RESIDENCE HALLS CLOSE for the fall semester on Saturday, December 22, 1984 at 12:00 noon. Make certain that you follow indicated "check-out" procedures to avoid any unnecessary inconvenience or charges.

3. RESIDENCE HALLS OPEN for Spring 1985 semester on Sunday, January 27, 1985 at 12:00 noon. No one will be allowed to return to the residence hall system prior to that time. Thank you.

Apathy this season?

To Whom it may concern:

It's the Christmas season. Everyone's supposed to be running around buying Christmas presents, getting in the Christmas spirit, and doing good deeds for others. This is the time that people are suppose to try to be extra nice to their fellow man, and do unto others as you would have them do unto you, and all that.

Well, yesterday, someone did unto me something I don't think he/she would want me to do unto him/her. Some very apathetic person backed into my new car, badly damaged the driver's side door, and left. No note of apology, no name or anything.

Not very nice as far as Christmas spirit goes, is it? Thanks to that person, I had to spend money on repairwork that I was planning to spend on Christmas presents. Seventy dollars, in fact.

I can't believe the apathy and gall that person demonstrated when he/she hit my car and left without a word. What's this world coming to?

I just wanted to say to this person: Thanks very much, and have a Merry Christmas.

All of us are sinners

I sincerely hope this letter does not end up in your "socially obnoxious" file. Although some may label it so, a more appropriate description would be "socially paramount."

I am a Christian and I want to make known my view of sexuality. It is one that is shared by many Christians (and hopefully by others as well) on this campus. However, it has never been represented in this paper, and differs greatly from those that have. I make it a point to read other people's views on this topic, and I hope that the Collegian will give me a chance to make my views known as well.

Let's consider for a moment what God has to say about sexuality. Oh, yes, He does have a view, and He tells us about it in His word, the Bible. God has a clearly defined plan for our sexual lives. He set it up between a man and a woman (Genesis 2:18, 24 — the only fit complement for man is woman). Oh, but how sin has twisted and corrupted God's intentions! Abominations, one of which is homosexuality, arose and abounds even today (Romans 1:26-27, I Corinthians 6:9-10). The point is that God considers homosexuality sin.

Another fact to consider is that we are all sinners. Make no mistake — I am a sinner. You are a sinner. (Romans 3:10,23). With this in mind, are we to discriminate against a group of people whose sin is different than ours? God does not name any sins as worse than any others. How can we? Discriminating against homosexuals is comparable to discriminating against those who lie or those who swear.

Let it be known that there are some of us who support human and civil rights for all people, which includes homosexuals and bisexuals, but do not support homosexuality or bisexuality. Just because we do not support the gay movement doesn't mean that we are homophobic, as we are commonly labeled. Before generalizing, think about it.

Fondling puzzles her

I have a complaint about the UMass campus that I have kept to myself long enough. There is a certain, shall we call them, type of person who has chosen a certain type of lifestyle through their choice of sex partners.

I see them all over the place, fondling each other, holding hands, hugging right out in public where everyone can see! In fact, there was a couple of them clutching each other in the entry way to the Campus Center coffee shop the other day and everyone who wanted in or out had to squeeze by their blatantly exhibitionist bundle of mutual adoration. Why should I have to look at that—especially on my way to breakfast!

Please don't get me wrong; I think that whatever two consenting adults do in private is their own business. I don't hate them all and I don't think they should be persecuted. I even have some really good friends who are heterosexual.

I just wonder why this type of person has to constantly demonstrate to the world that he or she has these curious "het" feelings.

Count and his puns

I have a particular bone to pick with Count Ramin Zahed for quoting Roy Scheider's remark that 2001 "left so much up in the air." While not a pun of monolithic proportions, I still find it an interesting Discovery.

OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

Its time has come

The direction of education for all students starting at the University of Massachusetts in the fall of 1986 and after is in the hands of the Faculty Senate today, when the long-debated General Education proposal is scheduled to come up for a final vote.

Because the University's core requirement system with 1,000 courses to choose from, is so loosely structured, the faculty began working three years ago to give it a more definite direction, to ensure that all students graduate with a broad range of knowledge in the arts and sciences. The plan that will be voted on today represents compromise on almost all sides, but should fulfill those original goals.

The plan would reduce the available core requirement classes to 300, none of which can be taken pass/fail. The current requirements would be replaced by specific courses in three general areas: "social world," "biological and physical world," and "analytical reasoning."

The proposal is not without problems. For instance, where will the money for teachers and equipment come from? Popular core requirement classes are already overcrowded, and the plan requires that some course classes have one teaching assistant for every 50 students. And every student will be required to take a laboratory science course, when University labs are described by some professors as "dismal."

The plan's rigidity presents a more complex problem. Departments will not be able to offer more than 25 percent of their courses as core requirements, and every other year, department course offerings will be evaluated, possibly creating some confusion from year to year.

The rule that no core requirement can be taken with a pass/fail option, while admirable in its intent, was argued and passed without student input.

But, considering that students can graduate from this University without ever having studied a natural science or read any serious literary works, the plan offers the best chance for improvement in the quality of education that every UMass student recieves.

The general education proposal would remedy the imbalance between the humanities and the sciences by giving students a more coherent education. The general education plan will help ensure that before a student graduates from this unversity he or she will have some knowledge of the historical development of our society and of other cultures. Graduates will more likely an appreciation of science and scientific knowledge to survive and participate in the modern world, and will have some command in the arts. Equally importantly, students will learn some ability to reason mathematically and quantitatively.

Three years is a long time to debate a proposal, the faculty senate must now put their words into action. Today the senate should commit themselves to a long term plan to add purpose to a students general education curriculum.

'Unfair' criticism of Undergrad Senate

"Any jackass can kick down a barn, but it takes a good carpenter to build one,"—Sam Rayburn. In the Collegian on yesterday, the Board of Editors asked some questions of the Student Senate. Unfortunately, they did this on the editorial page rather than asking the "SGA leaders." I believe this is unfair and irresponsible. I am always happy to answer questions, and hope people will read this.

You have two valid criticisms of the Senate. The meetings are often long, and are somtimes used to air personal differences. However, as Sam Rayburn articulated, identify the problem is easy, solving it is not. Obviously, representing 19,000 diverse and intense opinions is not easy. Some people seem only to want to create "trouble." However, this Senate is here to make decisions, not solve problems. The work of the Senate is done outside the senate meetings.

Improvements have been made. By increasing its advertising and outreach we achieved an almost full senate, the largest in years. We are working to speed up meetings, but to ensure people are heard they must be long.

The Senate committees have been active, as reflected in your own pages. The Academic Affairs committee has pushed for an Academic Grievance procedure, provided student input into the General Education proposal, is producing the CATE guide, supported Residential education and fought to maintain the Pass/Fail option for requirements.

The Public Policy committee has done a mailing to new students, lobbied in Boston for student legislation, organized a successful voter registration drive, and kept abreast of tuition policy.

The Budget's committee has worked hard to increase communication with student groups, while improving the budgeting process. The Governmental Affairs committee has run many elections and reviewed changes in Senate policy. The Finance committee has reviewed requests for funding and improved its process. The Rents and Fees committee has revitalized and is preparing for the Fee Review

Your attacks on the "SGA leaders" are innaccurate and reflect your ignorance of these issues. First, the Code of Student Conduct is being rewritten by students, after "SGA leaders" fought for that authority. We have made substantial progress and will undoubtedly finish our draft early in Januarv.

The swing space policy is being addressed very well by Stacy Roth and Gayle Wintjen. The SGA constitution is being negotiated by six students (not Jim Keller alone) and is going very well. We work about three hours every week on this issue, yet no member of the Board of Editors has asked us about its status, which is nearing completion.

We need responsible journalism, not constant editoralizing attacking the SGA, the Board of Governors, other student organizations and students. A student newspaper should support the student body, not demean it. At least you should research your facts.

Educate drivers, not drunks

Larry Bouchie

Recently, many states across the country have undertaken the related problems of alchohol consumption and drunken driving. Expressing concern about injuries and deaths caused by intoxicated drivers, some states have instituted new laws, penalties, and safeguards designed to curb alchohol-related automobile accidents.

The approach by many states, including Massachusetts, however, seems increasingly bent upon removing the rights of adults who wish to drink. In Massachusetts emphasis has largely been to restrict drinking by raising the legal drinking age, banning happy hours, and promoting alchohol education in the public schools.

Though the actions of those state legislators and social action groups who have initiated such measures would seem beyond criticism, they are taking entirely the wrong approach. Instead, the emphasis should be placed on this country's driving habits, and popular asumptions about proper driving practices.

By raising the legal drinking age to 21 in Massachusetts, this state and its younger citizens and once again faced with the singular dilemma of being eligible to vote and for the military draft while not being of legal drinking age. Most people beyond this age belittle the argument that it is improper to complain about being drafted before enjoying a legal drink, but only 15 years ago, this was a very real and realized situation.

Scores of Vietnam troops were killed during their first weeks in Vietnam, before they could imbibe a legal drink in their own country. To instruct an adult citizen that they are now responsible for the protection of their country and its ideals, but not yet responsible enough to be trusted with alchohol, is plainly ludicrous.

Other critics of higher drinking ages have also questioned whether such laws will merely have the effect of steering young citizens towards other, more easily available intoxicants, like illegal drugs. Recent reports by Massachusetts public education agencies have indicated the ready availability of marijuana, pills, and cocaine in public schools, which would tend to support this argument.

Another effect that should be noted of higher drinking ages is a finding by the state of Maine after the drinking age was raised there. For the period of one year following the raise in drinking age to 20, teenage alchohol-related deaths actually increased, not vice-versa.

In the face of such results, it would seem only logical that this approach is ineffective. In Massachusetts, though, only two measures have been instituted that confront the problem of driver awareness. Random roadblocks and stiffer penalties for intoxicated drivers have been used within the last two years with more noticable outcomes.

The first such outcome was the fruitful statistics of the number of intoxicated drivers who were apprehended during such roadblocks. In a swift, effective way, scores of drunken drivers are immediately removed from the road, while responsible drivers are only slightly inconvenienced.

The second outcome of these driving measures was the dramatic increase in legal penalties and incarcerations of repeat drunken drivers. This increase is so real and evident that many localities are striving to build new jail facilities soley for such offenders.

A simple comparison of the effect of restricted drinking versus restricted drinkdriving leads to the conclusion that this country and its citizens are more in need of re-examing their driving habits and assumptions. Unfortunately, however, such awareness measures have been slow to take place, and we are raising yet another generation of unaware, irresponsible drivers who are perfectly content to use their automobiles without much forethought.

Why do we reverse roles?

Rusty Denton

I have heard that once upon a time, men were men, women were women, and each one knew the difference. No more. The struggle for equalization of the sexes has resulted in role reversal, which is fine, but a lot of people wrongly seem to think that reversing roles means trading identities, to the loss of us all. When the political men are all trying to be strong, something is wrong.

Are you with me? Let me give you an example: the wimp. There are many who masquerade as men, but their true color is pure wimp. I've known some outstanding wimps.

The wimp has a "nice guy" complex. The impression he wishes to convey is that he is entirely reasonable, considerate, compassionate, and wouldn't offend anyone. He really isn't too much different from the debutantes of yesteryear with their "nice girl" complexes. That is the heart of his problem. You can manipulate a wimp pretty easily. Imply that he is uncaring or insensitive upon some point, and he'll become putty.

So far, the wimp seems like the perfect social companion — sweet and inoffensive. Let's look at the dark side of his character: cowardice. Sure, he'll get angry...if it pleases the crowd. He has enough courage to get a woman pregnant, but not usually enough to marry her. He's a great advocate of abor ton. He's afraid to make decisions, and will usually vanish rather than face a romantic break-up scenario. He's big on excuses. That's a worm, not a man. If you think this is a chronic American problem, then you have correctly identified the wimping of America.

Let's meet wimpy America's other half: the neo-assertive woman. Someone tell me why, if you don't think much of men with a chip on their shoulders or wishy-washy women, should you feel any differntly about wishy-washy men, or women with a chip on their shoulders?

Who is this neo-assertive woman? Well, I'm sure we'll all know what I mean by the term "screech politics." In case anyone doesn't, it's that shrill, highly emotional cascade of abuse, demands, and loudly suffering self-righteousness you hear so much in the Pioneer Valley. The screeching woman demands relationships on her own terms, and heaven help you if you cross her. Trifles outrage her. She may enthusiastically exhibit new-found abilities to be as publicly gross as any man, or she may just wish she could. She scorns gutless men, but can't tolerate dissenting opions. You'd better believe she's one tough woman.

Now let's be straight: how am I supposed to respect a wimp or a screecher? I don't begrudge compassion to men, but compassion is courageous. Rolling over for every popular cause isn't courageous, and it won't earn anyone's respect; they may love you now, but will they respect you in the morning? No, you'll just be another warm body who voted.

Furthermore, I don't begrudge leadership to women. But true leadership doesn't react violently to every idiocy, and you can't get respect by wrenching it from someone else. Respect starts with self-respect. Control starts with self-control.

What a pity. Male anger and female fear has been replaced by male fear and female anger. Neither case is desirable. When are people going to learn that they don't have to be doormat or battering ram to prove they're worth somethin? When will they learn that the quality of doing whatever they do best speaks for itself?

Who's the best dressed?

Kenneth B. Albert

I skipped my first class last Friday for the first time all semester. The problem was that it took me two hours to get dressd.

When I stepped out of the shower, I reached first for my trousers. Just as I was putting on my belt, however, I remembered that the People's Group Supporting Nuclear Proliferation were asking people to wear glow-in-the-dark pants that day as a token of support. As I hurriedly changed my pants to show the world that I support this worthy cause, I remember wondering how many people would be following their usual style and wear their glow-in-the-dark pants without having heard about the proposed symbolism of the act for that day.

No sooner had I put on my shirt and socks, than I realized that this was the same day that the National Movement to Legalize Heroin had asked everybody to wear short-sleeved shirts so they could proudly show the world theri track-marks and raise the public consciousness. Since my support for this group is only half-hearted, I decided to show a half-interest. Removing my shirt, I got out my scissors and cut off one sleeve, then put it back on and continued dressing.

I was already late by that point, and the situation only got worse when I glanced at my desk calendar and realized that the UMass Slob Council was asking their supporters to wear dirty t-shirts. I quickly removed what was left of my shirt and dug through my laundry-bag for my jogging t-shirt. Taking a deep breath I put it on.

Just as I was finally running out the door, I remembered that the United Association of Baby Seal Haters had urged everybody to wear a fur coat to symbolize nature's subservience and utility to man. Not owning a fur coat, yet not wanting to miss this opportunity to show the world where I stand, I quickly hunted down, killed, and skinned my neighbor's dog. Throwing its hide over my shoulders, I ran off to catch the bus.

When I arrived on campus, I happened to pass by the kissing booth set up by the Women Who Like Being Treated as Objects Organization. Since the woman being offered was very attractive, I got in line and waited for my chance to pay for physical gratification. By the time I left (since I so strongly support this group, I went through the line 6 times) my class had ended.

My hectic and emotionally taxing morning had left me drained, so I got back on the bus and returned home for a nap. Just before I dozed off, I realized how proud I was that by having carefully chosen my wardrobe that day, I had helped do my part ofr these mistreated and misunderstood minority groups. Together with all of my other fellow supporters, we had helped force an uncaring public to adopt a defensive attitude of feigned acceptance against the threat of being labeled prejudieed. I wonder what I'll wear tomorrow.

A brainwashed democracy

Mark Caldeira

Here's another slap in the face: America's "freedom" is an illusion. Regardless of the fact that the Soviet Union would be a much less desirable place to live, America is not Nirvana, as most conservative, self-centered people believe. I know: the truth hurts.

Sure, it is technically possible for a poor person (they do exist you know) to rise up to a position of great social and economical esteem. A person can work hard all one's life and "make it" here — but this one-in-a-million person succeeds economically not because of the greatness of America, but rather, because of the certain qualities this person possesses which are needed to "succeed" in this econmy: craftiness, ambition, subtlety, perseverance, greed, and an erotic obsession with material wealth. In other words, people succeed, and are "great" because of themselves, not because of their nation.

Don't be taken aback now; this country is still the Land of Opportunity: there is an infinite opportunity here to lie, cheat, bribe, blackmail, loophold, swindle, buy-out, coerce, and "bump off" that you will not find elsewhere. (Of course these activities can be found around the globe, but not in such ripe abundance as we are so "fortunate" to have here.) Thank you Uncle Sam.

You see comrades, a basic difference between the Soviet Union and the United States (which are actually quite similar) is that oppression is overt in the former and covert in the latter. You might not be able to gather around a street corner in the Soviet Union to express opposing political views without being outwardly confronted — and arrested, but on the other hand, even though expressing opposing political views is tolerated here, (somewhat tolerated, as my friends who got arrested in Washington D.C. will tell you), it is frequently a stifled activity: because when a reforming movement gains significant momentum, it is abruptly, yet usually secretly, halted. Who am I blaming? The System. What happened to Lincoln, Kennedy, Jackson State, Kent State, or Martin Luther King?

Free speech is becoming equivalent to smoking cigarettes: slow death. I, along with my roomate, have already received three not-so-pleasant death threats for articles we have written ("Gotta Love Those Radicals," Mon.... Nov. 26, and "Is This Free Speech?" Mon. Dec. 3). They said if I wrote another f#* *?ing article in the Collegian, they would blow my house up with "plastic explosives." Now this does scare me somewhat, but their threats have not prevented me from exercising my free speech. Of course the fact that I might be blown-up tomorrow should be irrelevant, right? Wrong! Once can never be to safe in a society where there lurk fecal-fettish people. Thier defecation smells like fascism.

You know, we always hear that all men (I'm glad they didn't include women in their devious undertakings!) are created equal, that all are endowed with certain, unalienable rights, among those are "Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness."' Yet how many times have we stopped and thought about it? I'm sorry people, but we are not born with these here: but we believe that we are. We have been classically conditioned to say "America" when we hear "freedom and democracy." I look around and see a bunch of Pavlov's dogs! We've all read 1984 yet we fail to see a that Orwell's words have come true: we are brainwashed by society, and we question nothing. WAKE UP, PEOPLE! We are all being cleverly and elusively hypnotized and we aren't even resisting. It's happening — just seriously look around you. And then look at yourself. Are you the person that you want history to record? Will someone in a future time say, "J.A. Bland—oh, wasn't that person one of those lost-minded clones, brainwahsed into absurdity by society?" All that I asking is that you question authority and be real.

As for my kindergarten comrades with the plastic explosives: Thank you for Disneyland!

Chanukah, then and now

I am a North American Jew living in Northampton, MA. December 18 is the beginning of Chanukah this year. The various responses of Jews throughout this eight-day period will reflect the diversity of the small community of Jews here. Some will light a Menorah and recite traditional blessings. Others will create their own rituals. Many will spend that eve reflecting upon the historical significance of this day.

In 167 B.C.E., Mattathias of the priestly clan of the Hasmoneans, left Jerusalem to escape religious persecutions perpetrated by the Syrian-Greek king, Antiochus IV. Antiochus tried to force Judeans to become Hellenized; to take on Greek customs, language, values, religion. However, when Antiochus' soldier went to the town where Mattathias lived to compel the Jews to sacrifice to Zeus, Mattathias and his sons revolted. This was the beginning of an uprising that lasted a quarter of a century and that for a time, returned to the Judeans their political and religious independence.

Two weeks ago in Northampton, I watched a slide show on Nicaragua, Guatemala and El Salvador. In Guatemala, the native peoples are being forced out of their homes in the mountains and are being interned in camps. In Nicaragua, U.S. Intelligence Agencies and U.S. armed forces mobilize, train and finance counter-revolutionaries in an attempt to destabalize the Sandinista government. For years, with U.S. encouragement, the Samoza dynasty had amassed enormous wealth at the expense of the Nicaraguan people. In the late 1970's the Sandinistas took the power away from the hated Samoza regime in a revolution that before it triumphed in 1979, had cost 40,000 lives.

The U.S. and other imperialist powers have the economic and technological power to destory what has been gained in Nicaragua. But the Sandinistas have what every colonized people has: the conviction that there is no other choice but to survive as a people, as a culture, as an amalgam of races struggling against world racism.

We are Jews. We have an historic tradition to draw upon. The challenge in Central America to political and cultural autonomy, threatens us at our very core. In 1984, our security in the world as Jews comes from joining the struggle for self determination in Central America. Four ourselves, and for the peoples of Central America, we must let the U.S. government know what the Jews told Antiochus IV in 167 B.C.E. Let Chanuka remind us. We must insist that the U.S. government, 'Let my people go.'

live wire
by Peter Wissoker

Music Music Music. Give the gift of music. Gift, gift, gift. It's time to sit down and think about what there is to do between finals that won't leave you hung over for your 8 o'clock exam.

Fortunately there is an abundance of live music in the Valley in the upcoming week. Before finals you can go see the return of Michael Gregory Jackson to the Wok after about two years. He's not playing with Signal anymore, but his new music is pretty good. Jackson played last year at the Pond Series. For those of you who were there, he was the interesting one. He will be playing with some friends from around here.

Also on Friday night: David Bromberg and Arlo Gutherie will be playing at Springfield Symphony Hall. The Jon Butcher Axis will be playing at the Blue Wall.

On Saturday night WSYL and WZZZ will be bringing Black Flag, with the Outpatients, Saint Vitus Dance, Don't Ask, and Tom Troccoli's Dog in the Student Union Ballroom. The doors open at 6:30. Don't be scared off because you've heard about those hardcore bands on Chips and other such shows. Black Flag has mellowed out and now they're just a really good political rock band.

Also on Saturday night the Mongrel Puppy and the Drongos will be playing at the Zone in Springfield. The Mongrel Puppy are great, ask anyone who saw them open up for the Del Fuegoes at the Rusty Nail two weeks ago. The Drongos also seem to be pretty good, making their way to the top by playing outdoors on New York street-corners. This "hardworking" (gotta love those adjectives) band is supposed to be realy good live.

After all that go home and study. Then, after your finals do as I do. Before you go home take a trip down to Hartford to see the greatest rock and roll band in the world, The Kinks. No two ways about it, it's much better (aesthetically and psychologically) to see the Kinks than to see your parents. Not only that, but live radio concerts from their last tour reveal that they aren't just playing the same stuff anymore. It should be good.

After that I go and see Einstein on the Beach, because I have someone who was nice enough to buy me tickets. There are still a few tickets left and it is certainly worth it to make the pilgrammage to New York. For the rest of youze I recommend getting Laurie Anderson's United States, Live. It's really entertaining (see book review in yesterday's Collegian) and it makes a great gift for yourself.

Upcoming concerts include Betty Carter at the Iron Horse and Areosmith in Springfield.

Trivia Answer/question. Taj Mahal went to the Stockbridge School of Agriculture at UMass. You can win an eight song excerpt from that Laurie Anderson album I was drooling over earlier if you can tell me how she used to know when to end her concerts in Italy when she was playing out of doors with her tapeloop violin. Bring the answer down to the Arts Desk and please, put what time you brought it down.

Have a good vacation.

Murphy carries Beverly Hills Cop

By HERB RAMY Collegian Staff &
MATT MACHERA Collegian Correspondent

A streetwise Detroit cop named Axel Foley (Eddie Murphy) takes his vacation time to go to Beverly Hills and solve the murder of his ex-con friend. In the process of his investigation he is thrown out of a window, arrested for disturbing the peace, and shot at. It doesn't sound like much of a plot, but with Murphy you don't really need one. He displays many of the same comic antics we saw in 48 Hours; he has an entire shipping company believing that he's an undercover customs inspector, etc. The main difference between the two movies is that Beverly Hills Cop operates with no big name co-stars.

As already stated, Murphy is the movie's only true star. The rest of the acting is fair, but beyond Murphy there was only one other actor that stood out. Bronson Pinchot, who played a minor role as an art gallery assistant was the only other character to get any laughs.

In examining the success of this movies one only has to examine the success of Eddie Murphy. He continues to be the hottest screen comedian since Richard Pryor. His timing and delivery turn ordinary situations into hilarious fun. Without him we are left with only fair acting and a shallow plot. Although his appearance doesn't correct these flaws, it does make Beverly Hills Cop a picture well worth seeing.

Let's Active: joyous rock

By ELIZABETH C. LANGLOIS
Collegian Correspondent

Let's Active's long awaited debut album is like discovering toys under the Christmas tree as a child. Mitch Easter imparts a sense of joy and innocence to all his songs that is rarely heard in rock anymore.

Easter recorded Cypress with bassist Faye Hunter and drummer Sara Romweber, but a recent change in the band's lineup (Romweber quit) has expanded Let's Active to a five piece group, including members of the Windbreakers, one of Easter's many productions.

Cypress is an enigmatic but totally delicious album embellished with swirling, haunting melodies and varied moods. The production is dense and rich with layered acoustic 12 string guitars, and washes of organ echoing through the verses reminiscent of Led Zeppelin's best work. Easter himself has referred to his band as Led's Active, as the aforementioned band is quite an influence, as are most definitely the Beatles, due in no small part to the thoroughly ingratiating vocal harmonies.

Mitch Easter, pop craftsman that he is, scatters hooks throughout his songs like gems, just waiting to be greedily discovered by the avid listener. There are so many great songs here that it's hard to pick out the best tracks. There are neat production tricks on most of them, and little snatches of melody that are immediately catchy. "Ring True" is charming with its psychedelic vocal distortions at the end of each chorus. Faye sings this one as well as "Blue Line," the first single from the album, with its sit arish guitar figures and bell-like ringing of guitars near the end. There is also the post-psychedelic muscle of "Waters Part" with its huge-sounding production a la Jimmy Page, and its very tender sentiments, "the waters part when our eyes see together." Also especialy stirring are "Flags for Everything" with its Led Zeppelinish acoustic guitars and ever present organ, and "Prey" also with a Zeppelin slant, and a short break complete with harmonica and heavy-handed Bonham-like skin pounding.

Cypress is captivating in its innocence, but no craftsmeister with Easter's production experience could have stumbled onto such a sound. This is a thoroughly painstaking work, but nothing sounds contrived which is all the more amazing. I just wish there were more artists like Mitch Easter, with his innate sense of fun and childlike demeanor. Cypress is a thoroughly enjoyable album, and a must have for any serious listener tired of jaded commercial pretensions and MTC doldrums.

Out of the darkroom

by MICHAEL PHILLIPS
Collegian Correspondent

"Birds can fly but flies can't bird." So too, with artists and photographers. The artist can take photos, but can the photographer be an artist? An interesting claim is made by this exhibition, "Photography as Art." People talk of the photographer's "eye." It's a shame more emphasis was not placed on his brain. I know of a blind man who can take "better" pictures than most sighted. Most modern cameras can take a picture by themselves. They only need to be pointed in the right direction. All the "mystery of the darkroom" nonsense is just bologna, merely to give the photograph some credibility with the Protestant work ethic. As for composition, nicely cropped edges, blacks and whites and fineness of grain, these are only important in an image with nothing else to offer.

Ever since M.O.M.A. gave photography "Art value" by artificially ensuring an increase in price (by destroying the negatives and creating rigid formats for the photographer to adhere to), photography has nailed itself into a coffin, using the same hammer with which it nailed in painting. The camera is a tool, a machine which produces the result of an optical, chemical reaction. It is important to teach the workings of this machine but not of this photographic convention.

The show at Wheeler is an example of people making photographs which adhere to this convention. And as such it is very successful.

There are some "successful" compositions, some very nice blacks and whites and the odd interesting subject. There is some thoughtful interplay between the images and the titles. For instance, Jay Goldman's "Untitled", is obviously a fork. I drew some comparison between "This is not a Pipe" and "This is not a photograph of a pipe", and "I don't know what this is." Melanie Gaier's "Parasol", is a cleverly structured composition which holds the delicate object in a tentative balance between high contrast and geometry.

There seems to have been a certain regularity of vision in the show, with very little experimentation. This gave rise to the above criticism. Maybe it is due to the structure of the class. There is so much you can do in the dark room without a camera. Maybe a little more experiment might be more educational to the student and a little more exciting for us. You can't expect Eisenstiens from novices. What you can do is inspire, create a lust for creativity and not expose students to the musty halls of linear thought.

The show did have a freshness when all is said and done. The interplay of image and title gave a sense of thought, which in turn, in some of the images, created a sense of time, something difficult when intentionally at a sixtieth of a second. I hope this does not sound too pessimistic. The Wheeler Gallery has put on some of the most interesting shows on campus, this show being one of them. I am just making a plea for photography. May its horizons expand and not be contracted by conformity. What I saw was a lot of enthusiasm, a lot of creativity and a certain amount of freedom of thought. It would be sad if these students became "Photographers."

Trower still a "dynamo"

By JACK BRESNAHAN
Collegian Staff

On Friday night, Robin Trower lit up a throng of eager listeners. In their consistent tradition, the powers that brought this musical dynamo to the Rusty Nail. Rumor has it that the Nail and its property will soon become apartments or condos, so we're witnessing the passing of an era.

The Rusty Nail was packed near capacity to hear Robin Trower, one of the finest guitarists in the world, take them on an aural trip. The former lead player for Procol Harem, Trower is a tenacious survivor from the sixties. Having learned much from Jimi Hendrix personally, he demonstrated that the Hendrix sound is not dead.

This energetic trio played a lot from the Bridge of Sighs album, including "Too Rolling Stoned," the title cut, and "Day Of The Eagle." Leaving the vocals to his bassist, Trower took the spotlight in showing off his skills. On songs like "Beyond the Mist" and "Rock Me," he made great use of the wha wha and the whammy bar. The music was extremely psychodelic, and the audience was highly responsive. He also wowed them on "In This Place" and "Little Bit Of Sympathy."

Arts & Science Majors!

All dressed up, with nowhere to go?

It's not too late to think about Northeastern's MS in Professional Accounting Program.

This Program is a 15-month course of study designed for graduates of Arts and Sciences and other non-accounting majors. It's a full-time graduate program divided into five quarters, preparing you for the CPA Examination and a career in public accounting. The third quarter is an internship where you are employed by a leading public accounting firm such as Arthur Andersen, Alexander Grant, Coopers & Lybrand, Peat Marwick, or Price Waterhouse. In addition to student loans and tuition scholarships, significant financial aid is provided by internship earnings, which averaged $5,000 for the three month internship last year.

You still have time to apply for the class beginning in June. Send for brochure, or call (617) 437-3244.

Please send more information about the MS in Accounting Program.

More books for giving

by BRADFORD VERTER and TAARA EDEN HOFFMAN
Collegian Staff

In addition to the books listed yesterday, here are more of 1984's notable publications:

Lawrence Ferlinghetti, author of the classic A Coney Island of The Mind, and publisher of Ginsberg, Kerovac, Burroughs, et al, has written his upteenth book of poetry, Over All the Obscene Boundaries (New Directions, $6.95). This is not one of his better books, and contains such awfully awkward phrases as "Sartre's nausea filled my being" and "But she was really like Nora in Nightwood". Ferlinghetti is accomplished enough that he doesn't have to crib from Barnes.

It can be fun listening to a prima donna talk about herself, as Galina Vishnevskaya shows in Galina: A Russian Story (Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, $19.95). The diva, wife of Mstislav Rostropovich, is a compulsive name dropper (Brezhnev, Solzhenitzen, et al.), but entertaining. Whitney Balliett's Jelly Roll, Jabbo and Fats (Oxford, $6.95) also deals with singers and musicians, offering profiles of fourteen jazz artists. Ernst Pawel's A Nightmare of Reason (Farrar, Straus & Giroux, $25.50) is not only a brilliant study of the life of Franz Kafka, but a lively depiction of Prague in the '20s as well.

Kenneth Anger justifies his last name in Hollywood Babylon II (Dutton, $24.95). Much nastier than the first book, this features more sensational stories and slanderous photos from tinseltown. Much more down-to-earth is Ever Since Eve, by Nancy Sorel (Oxford, $14.95), which is a witty collection of anecdotes about childbirth.

For the librarian in your life, Barbara McNeil has compiled the Twentieth-Century Author Biographies Master Index (Gale Research Co., $60.00, $25.00 paper). This massive volume is a comprehensive listing of biographical sources.

If you have a penchant for polyester, The Hawaiian Shirt, by H. Thomas Steele (Abbeville, $19.95) is the book for you. A pictorial reminiscence of the good old days when a Hawaiian shirt was an art object, not just a garment, Steele's book is lavish and colorful. Although it does not go into detail on the consequences the shirt has had on contemporary society, it does provide an interesting and informative history of the "aloha shirt". It's even bound in genuine shirt fabric. Now that's class!

Speaking of class, Metheun has re-released the Noel Coward Song-Book. Insodently out-of-print for twenty years, the book offers the words and music to 51 wonderful songs, including: "I'll See You Again", "Mad Dogs and Englishmen", "Mirabelle", and "Don't Let's Be Beastly to the Germans." A bargain at $14.95, The Noel Coward Song-Book has enough sophisticated wit to correct any oaf.

"Castle: an idea waiting to be born of rock." So starts Castles (Bantam, $24.95), a beautiful book of magic, lords and ladies, dragons, dungeons, and hidden passages. Alan Lee takes the reader back in time through the age of myths, romance and fantasy with delicate drawings of wonder. Woven through this magnificent world is the captivating, vibrant prose of David Day. Castles is an adventurous and powerful combination of art and legend brought to life. People of all ages will be fascinated and delighted by this enticing and enchanting volume.

A bit more sophisticated but just as colorful is Rebecca Blake's Forbidden Dreams (Quartet, $40.00). A consultant for the film The Eyes of Laura Mars, Blake has been taking lavishly sensuous photographs since 1972. Ranging from lavishly sensuous photographs since 1972. Ranging from the sublime to the silly, these glamorous glimpses into a decadent fairyland are a celebration of surface beauty. It is a striking book, yet I don't see it breaking new ground in feminist theory.

FINANCIAL AID OFFICE IMPORTANT NOTICE

All undergraduate dormitory residents will receive their financial aid forms (FAF) via campus mail in their dorms during the week of December 17th 1984.

Off campus and graduate students can pick up FAF's during this time period at the Financial Aid Office - 243 Whitmore. The FAF filing deadline for academic year 1985-86 is March 1, 1985.

The U.S. Government has increased its military involvement throughout the Central American region. Since the harassment of Nicaragua has increased over the past few weeks we find ourselves at the brink of a major U.S. escalation.

THIS MUST BE STOPPED

We, the undersigned, oppose any aggression by the United States government against the sovereign nation of Nicaragua, or any other nation in the region.

WE CAN NOT AND WILL NOT STAND FOR U.S. WAR IN CENTRAL AMERICA.

UMass basketball coach Ron Gerlufsen confers with point guard Carl Smith at Hartford last Saturday. The 2-3 Minutemen face powerful Northeastern at the Springfield Civic Center on Saturday at 2 p.m. Smith will start the game despite strained tendons in his righ hand.

Basketball notebook

Russell, in top form

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

The brighest spot for the 2-3 University of Massachusetts basketball team has been the play for senior co-captain Donald Russell.

The 6-2 guard from Mt. Vernon, N.Y. has been scoring at a great clip with a team leading average of 17.4 points-per-game, the best since his freshman year.

He is coming off a 27 point performance against Boston University, a triple overtime 71-70 loss for the Minutement. Russell is shooting 55 percent from the floor at 31-of-56 and 73 percent from the line. He leads the team with 11 steals.

Senior forward Bobby Braun has also looked sharp. The 6-6 New Jersey product has been seeing close to 37 minutes a game, a career high, and is averaging 9.8 points and 8.2 rebounds.

Yet, UMass is 2-3. They were in all three losses and should have beaten Hartford and BU, but lacked the killer instinct late in the second half to put their opponents away for good.

In both games, the Minutemen failed to capitalize on chances from the foul line, missing 9-of-22 against Hartford in the second half and three one and ones against the Terriers in the final five minutes of regulation.

On Saturday, Northeastern 3-1, invades the Civic Center with a potent offense that features Reggie Lewis, Wes Fuller and Andre LeFleur, all sophomores and all good. The Minutemen will have to be on top of their game to avoid going 2-4.

The Minutemen are 3-0 and have broken a long-standing school records for points in a meet. Weil leads a group of impressive freshman that have blended nicely with the veteran upperclassmen.

"He's a real pleasure to work with," Johnson said. The coach also said that the entire team has felt the impact of Weil's talent and respects his determination to the sport and his grades. He is close with his family, they travel the two hours to see all the UMass home meets, he does well in school and excels in his sport. "you've got to talk to him to believe him," Johnson said. "He's quite a kid."

UMass gymnast Roberto Weil does a difficult spaggot move in practice

UMass' Roberto Weil:

Venezuelen gymnast keys Minutemen's success

By KATHLEEN HANNAN
Collegian Correspondent

Roberto Weil has come a long way from working out on a fence in Venezuela.

Weil, a freshman on the University of Massachusetts gymnastics team, is currently ranked second in the all-around on the team with an impressive score of 52.1, trailing only junior Joe DeMarco's 53.2.

Weil will tell you with hesitation that he feels no competition with his teammate, but admits that he may work up a little aggression later in the season. To be the best on the team is among his goals, and he's willing to work as hard as he must to achieve it.

Weil started that hard work in his native country when he started doing a basic dismount, the penney drop, on a fence in his hometown with his best friend, Jose Fernandez.

The pair worked for hours improving their strength and talent and trying new tricks. Weil stresses that if not for his friend and the inspiration of his father, also a fine gymnast, he wouldn't be the exceptional competitor he is.

During his freshman year of high school in Venezuela his family moved to Wellesley, Mass. where he continued to train.

Weil's mother said that he would ride his bike six miles to the train station before jumping a train to get to practice, no matter what the weather.

"He's extremely dedicated, he studies often and never gets into trouble," his mother said.

Weil feels he has improved tremendously under the coaching of UMass' Roy Johnson.

"He's an awesome coach and so is John Macurdy (the assistant coach)," Weil said. "I'm getting much better."

The engineering major has worked out with the Venezuelan Olympic team and plans on trying out in February. Weil feels that he has, "a pretty good chance because the guys there are not as good as the guys are here."

Johnson added, "I haven't seen the Venezuelan team. He has a way to go on his compulsories and he's got a lot to learn, but maybe he could pull it off."

As far as the U.S. team is concerned, Weil admits, "I have no chance at all, it's way to early and I haven't even thought of it...yet."

Marino, eight Dolphinsmake Pro-Bowl

Hannah also honored

NEW YORK (AP) - Dan Marino, who has shattered one National Football League passing record and is poised to break another, was one of eight members of the Miami Dolphins named Wednesday to the AFC Pro Bowl squad.

Marino, who broke one NFL single-season record with his 44 touchdown passes and who is 59 yards short of the single-season yardage mark with one game left, was one of three unanimous choices on the AFC team for the Pro Bowl. The game will be played Jan. 27 at Aloha Stadium in Honolulu.

The other unanimous choices were Marcus Allen of the Los Angeles Raiders, who also placed eight players on the team, and safety Kenny Easley of the Seattle Seahawks, who had seven.

Marino and Allen are joined as starters in the backfield by running back Freeman McNeil of the New York Jets.

Other offensive starters include wide receivers Mark Duper of Miami and John Stallworth of Pittsburgh; Anthony Munoz of Cincinnati and Brian Holloway of New England; guards John Hannan of New England and Ed Newman of Miami, and center Dwight Stephenson of Miami.

The defensive starters are ends Howie Long of the Raiders and Mark Gastineau of the New York Jets; nose tackle Joe Nash of Seattle; linebackers Rod Martin of the Raiders; Mike Merriweather and Robin Cole of Pittsburgh, and Steve Nelson of New England; cornerbacks Mike Haynes and Lester Hayes and safety Vann McElroy of the Raiders.

The team was chosen by a vote of each of the AFC's 14 coaches and the NFL Players Association members on each of the team. Each team's vote was counted as one, the players as another.

Other members of the squad are quarterback Dave Krieg of the Seahawks; running backs Earnest Jackson of San Diego and Sammy Winder of Denver; tackle Henry Lawrence of the Raiders; guard Mike Munchak of Houston; center Mike Webster of Pittsburgh; tight end Todd Christensen of the Raiders; defensive end Art Still of Kansas City; nose tackle Bob Baumhower of Miami; linebackers Andre Tippett of New England and A. J. Duhe of Miami, cornerback Dave Brown of Seattle and safety Deron Cherry of Kansas City.

The team also includes for the first time a designated special teams player, Fredd Young of the Seahawks. Reggie Roby of Miami is the punter, Norm Johnson of the Seahawks the place-kicker and Louis Lipps of Pittsburgh the kick returner.

Look to snap losing streak

UM women host Conn

By JOHN A. NOLAN

coming off two straight losses, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team hosts the University of Connecticut tonight at 8 p.m. at Amherst College.

UConn enters the game sporting a 2-2 record and hopes to recover from last week's (84-68) beating at the hands of the University of Rhode Island. The Huskies are led by 6-2 senior forward Leigh Curl, the team's leading scorer the past two seasons. For UMass to win, it will be imperative to know her whereabouts at all times.

"She's strong inside," UM assistant coach Dawn Henderson said. "We're going to have to deny her the ball."

The Huskies will likely sit back in a tight two-three zone defense, forcing opponents to hit from the outside. Not known as a pressure ballclub, the game should provide some relief for the beleaguered Minutemen who come off consecutive 28 turnover performances, a statistic the team must reduce if it expects to break its two game tailspin.

Captain Jerrie Bernier has shown signs of breaking out of her early season scoring slump with 18 points in her last two games. In the UMass win over Boston University, Matthews was described by a cable sports caster as "red hot". Barbara Hebel has been a consistent scorer (12.2p.p.g.), but has yet to return to the form that produced 16.1 points per game last year.

"Our biggest goal is to decrease the amount of turnovers we've been committing," head coach Barbara Stevens said.

Just a few final thoughts...

As another semester rolls by, they seem to go faster each time, there is plenty of action in the world of sports. Yes, it is brutally cold out but baseball still draws the headlines. Now, last week when I picked the Mets to take it all, I had no idea the deal they had in store. Seven-time All-Star Gary Carter will now be behind the plate for the Mets, but they had to give up the popular Hubie Brooks and three others...Carter is just what the doctor ordered for the Mets. He is still a clutch hitter and should be able to work well with the wealth of talent that the Mets pitching staff has. Hubie was a good hitter and was improving defensively but was still shaky with the glove...He once made three errors in one inning. Only a trip to the Bursar's office would equal that humiliation.

Quickly shifting gears, only the Bowl Games are left for college football, so here are a few picks, for what they're worth (about $1.50, without tax)...Cotton: B.C. should win. They have a half-decent guy at QB, but his name escapes me. Rose: USC got in a late-season slump, but they are too tough for Ohio State. Sugar: LSU-Nebraska should be a high-scoring affair, but the Huskers will have too much offense. Orange: This will be the game to watch, with OU's defense stopping the Huskie attack. Fiesta: This should be a good contest. UCLA against Miami. If you like passing, watch it, and watch Miami in a squeaker...I can't believe they have bowls like the Cherry and Florida Citrus. What's next. The DC Prime Roast Beef au Jus Bowl, of course.

As January rolls around, look for a few trends. The Celts and Oilers will stretch their leads in their respective sports, Michael Jordan will find 31 new ways to dunk, the Cleveland Cavs will already be out golfing, for they have no reason to continue, and the 49ers will nip the Dolphins in the best Super Bowl ever.

A couple of final notions. I'd like to thank Sports Editor Pete Abraham for giving me the freedom to write this column and the guts to put my picture on his page every week...Thanks to all the people who helped me with ideas, compliments, and criticisms- they are the best teachers. But, don't get me wrong, I'll be back next semester. Until then, have the best holiday you've ever had.

No more need be said.

Faculty OKs mandatory course plan

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

Three years of debate came to a close yesterday when the faculty senate unanimously passed a general education plan which seeks to add more social and cultural diversity in the University of Massachusetts curriculum beginning with students entering in 1986.

The current core requirement system came under fire almost four years ago when it was criticized for being too broad and not giving students a well rounded education.

The plan, formed by the general education council, will redistribute and replace the C,D and E core requirements with specific courses in areas called "social world," "biological and physical world," and "analytical reasoning."

Senate Sec. Robert Jones said the amendments and re-wording added to the plan during the six of seven meetings this semester will be sent to Provost Richard O'Brien for possible further revisions or recommendation. The plan will also require approval from Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey and the Board of Trustees before it is final.

O'Brien said he did not see any rough spots that may need to be smoothed out but that budgetary implications may pose a problem.

The plan "gives a philosophy behind each required core course" and "encourages students to think actively."
— Professor Joel Naroff

The Program and Budget Council has estimated that the plan will require about $464,000 for one-time costs and yearly on-going cost of $611,000 that include paying for additional teaching assistants, laboratory costs and for implementing the analytical reasoning program.

O'Brien said funding for the plan will come from University budgets, possible requests from the Board of Trustees and Legislature and diverting funds from other campus priorities.

Joel Naroff, the council's chairman, said in an interview last week that the council's major concern was to develop a curriculum that would give students some knowledge and history of their own society as well as others, an appreciation of science and the arts, the ability to reason mathematically and quantitatively, and also the ability to express one's thoughts in writing.

He said that unlike the current system, the general education plan "gives a philosophy behind each required core course" and "encourages students to think actively" as opposed to passively.

The general education plan's redistribution of requirements include six courses in the social world area with:

— two courses in the arts, one of which must be literature
— two courses in historical studies
— two courses in social and behavioral sciences
— at least two of the courses within this area must carry a social and cultural diversity designation.

In the biological and physical world area, a course in biological sciences and a course in the physical science, one of which must have a laboratory class attached, are required in the plan.

Two courses must be taken in the area of analytical reasoning, where the first tier level can be satisfied through a competency examination.

Courses to fulfill the general education requirements will be selected according to their course content, not the department in which they are taught. In addition, students will not be able to take any required courses pass/fail.

About 50 Amherst College students rallied yesterday to protest their school's $18 million worth of investments in American companies that do business in apartheid South Africa. The students, members of the student organizations Development Dialogue and Straight Ahead, which are urging the school to divest, held their demonstration outside the college comptroller's office.

UMass fiscal discrepancies discovered

By GREG BROWN
Collegian Staff

A state audit of the University of Massachusetts has found a discrepancy of $685,742 between the University's records and the official records of the state treasurer.

A report of the audit, released Dec. 5 by State Auditor John J. Finnegan, also revealed an "improperly maintained account" containing $239,104 in uncashed employee paychecks. The report said this was in violation of state law.

State laws require that $100,814 of that account be returned to the state treasurer, and the remaining $138,290 in uncashed checks should be "written off, and the proceeds transferred back to the trust fund or other account from which disbursements were made," according to the audit report.

Joyce K. Hosie, a spokeswoman for the University President's Office, was unavailable for comment yesterday, but said in a prepared statement Wednesday, "A number of the constructive comments and suggestions to the University's cash management program have been incorporated during the past two years, either by improvements to or automation of its cash system." Hosie's statement failed to say which suggestions were implemented.

The audit cited a number of deficiences in the University's cash management system, which includes the Boston, Amherst, and Worcester campuses. UMass Treasurer Robert Brand was also unavailable for comment.

Other "deficiencies" cited in the audit include:

- "Weaknesses concerning the operation of petty cash funds at the Worcester campus and various checking accounts being administered at other University locations."
- "Unreconciled differences in payroll advance accotnt" resulting in the $685,742 discrepancy.
- "Improperly retained interest earned on state funds." The report states that the University is withholding interest income due the Commonwealth.

All these cash management practices were sternly questioned in the audit, which recommends that the University "seek an opinion from the Office of the attorney general concerning the desposition of outstanding checks."

Gay community urges environment of 'civility'

By LESLEY CLARK
Collegian Staff

Saying that several homophobic acts have occurred on campus since last week's show of support for the gay and lesbian community at a rally Friday, three students yesterday presented the faculty senate with demands to create "a campus environment that is truly one of civility."

Members of the Concerned Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay and Heterosexual Ally Community presented the demands to the administration Friday after about 100 students turned out for a rally to counter a "Heterosexuals Fight Back" demonstration, which drew only five people. Some members of the group met with the staff of Dennis Madison, vice chancellor for Student Affairs yesterday, though Madson was not present.

The vice chancellor is expected to meet with Chancellor Joseph D. Duffy Monday when he returns from his trip to Argentina to discuss the events during his absence.

Students at the faculty senate meeting yesterday said recent homophobic acts included a bomb scare at Friday's People's Gay Alliance dance, the slur "hang a homo week" written on a poster advertising last week's gay and lesbian awareness day and signs reading "Gay-busters, we're coming next semester"

These acts are "posing some very very violent, physical threats," said PGA member Tammy Boots. "These threats are not only directed towards the homosexual community- heterosexuals carrying balloons were harassed Friday," she added.

The two-page proposal for administrative action includes demands for the establishment of an Office of Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay concerns, to provide sensitivity training; the hiring of a Heterosexism Awareness trainer for the Southwest Residential Area; funding a temporary position in the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy for the same until the Student Government Association can afford to hire one and the expansion of library resources to include selections relevant to gay people.

PGA member David Carney said the group will meet with the Faculty Senate Rules Committe Jan. 30 to seek its endorsement of the proposal.

BABY'S BODYGUARD — One of 80 Cabbage Patch dolls is unloaded from an armored truck yesterday at a Newington, N.H. mall where the dolls will be given away by drawings. The shortage of the dolls has prompted desperate shoppers to steal them, wait in long lines for a chance to buy them and even beat up other owners to procure the unique toys.

Mass. education plan slipping

BOSTON (AP) - With time running out, Rep. James Collins is making a final effort to salvage his revised $400 million-a-year plan to overhaul the state's public school system.

Collins, House chairman of the Education Committee, has seen support slip away in recent weeks for his ambitious proposal to modernize the state's public education system and to provide a blueprint to carry the schools to the year 2000.

He told House members last night he was willing to give in on several proposed amendments, then work for quick agreement on remaining issues.

"I always identify with 'The Miracle On 34th Street,'" the Amherst Democrat joked while discussing his last-ditch effort with reporters.

Collins is one of the few legislators left who thinks the bill still has a chance for passage in the last remaining days of the session. Several senators have said they won't even consider the bill, even if it passes the House, and Gov. Michael S. Dukakis still has problems with the overall cost.

The bill retains its call for basic skills tests for students, limits on class size, increased state control of local school curriculum, expanded use of classroom computers and much higher salaries for teachers.

On the remaining questions, Collins said he would push for quick agreement on compromise solutions.

—STATE CONTROL... The House rejected an intial plan that would force local districts to submit a five-year education plan to the state Board of Education, and let the state take over local distribution of state funds if the plan was inadequate.

He said the latest plan calls for the state to review and comment on local school plans, but step in only for obviously substandard districts with high dropout rates and low student test scores.

Open bars illegal

WORCESTER (AP) - The state Alcoholic Beverage Control Commission has reminded local officials that open bars on New Year's Eve even with a fixed price for all night drinking, is a violation of the state's new ban on "happy hour"-style promotions.

George R. McCarthy, chairman of the ABCC, wrote to the Worcester License Commission that his office had received several inquiries about New Year's Eve party packages which include "open bars."

The ABCC has determined that an open bar at a function open to the public would be a violation of the happy hour and discount drink ban, which took effect Dec. 10, he said.

"The Commission considers any "open bar" function for which a member of the public can purchase tickets or could have purchased tickets to be a violation of the regulations," McCarthy wrote.

Quincy residents plan training on widening of racial awareness

QUINCY (AP) - One week after an "Aunt Jemima" in blackface and a red kerchief was allowed to entertain young students in this nearly all-white suburb, officials agreed yesterday to start racial"sensitivity training" for school teachers and staff.

"At last, the people of Quincy are rolling up their sleeves and admitting they have a problem," said Alex Rodriguez, director of the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination, which recommended the training program.

Quincy Superintendent of Schools John Osterman said he and his staff started planning the program yesterday and will present it to the school committee for approval at an upcoming meeting.

The appearance of the Aunt Jemima, a white cafeteria aide hired by Snug Harbor Elementary School to promote a special pancake lunch, sparked charges of racism from a black mother, one of 200 blacks in this city of 84,000 residents just south of Boston.

Doris Gardner said her 10-year-old daughter was taunted with racial slurs such as "Aunt Jemima is your mammy" after the promotion.

Anti-rape team gets needed student input

By REBECCA THATCHER
Collegian Staff

Increasing the level of student involvement in anti-rape work has been the chief accomplishment of the Student Senate rape task force formed in October.

Task force member Liisa Trocki said the group had originally intended to work on alleviating lighting problems on campus, but on the advice of experts in the field of violence against women, they turned their efforts toward educating the community to prevent "date rape."

"We were not very aware of the resources available and programs that were already in place, so what was brought to our attention immediately was that the programs that were in place just needed more support both from people power and financial support," Trocki said.

Trocki said a recent article in The Chronicle of Higher Education had supported the main focus of the rape task force.

It stated: "Many institutions have taken such measures as improving campus lighting and installing additional locks on dormitory doors to prevent rape by strangers. Instead, experts say, college officials should conduct seminars and discussions to make students aware of the problem of acquaintance rape."

Rape task force member Robert Griffin, an Orchard Hill Area Government senator, said the rape awareness workshop offered by professionals from the Everywoman's Center and the Department of Public Safety was a "program that I think everyone should see."

He said it outlined the realities of rape, including the counseling and medical aid. "It's all here on campus, the only problem is that the police can't go looking for rape victims."

The task force is planning a media campaign and a rape awareness week next semester to "make the University a safer place," Griffin said.

The group's work on lighting and call boxes is progressing too, according to Student Government co-President Rick Patrick.

New lights are planned in many areas throughout campus, including near Whitmore, Dickinson, the Rhododendren Garden, the walk near the Chancellor's House and Fisher Lab, Hamden Dining Commons and Boyden Gym, Patrick said.

He also said a proposal for 15 new call boxes was going to the chancellor and possibly to the Board of Trustees.

Vendors cash in on holiday

Campus Center 'good atmosphere' for business

By RENEE BACHER
Collegian Staff

Richard Tyroler, a University of Massachusetts student, sits behind a table in the Campus Center concourse among stacks of sweaters as he calmly eyes the passing students.

"I'm doing very well here," says Tyroler. He has been vending in the Campus Center for two years and selling at flea markets for 10. The concourse is a good atmosphere for vending, according to Tyroler, but "At flea markets people are specifically there to buy things. Here it's only students buying at the spur of the moment".

The holiday shopping rush is a big event for vendors selling their goods on the concourse, according to Board of Governors vending coordinator Jim Thomson.

"The first week of the semester is the hardest for vendors to get a spot to sell their merchandise but many try to get in for the Christmas rush too. The people who've been here through the semester have priority for the weeks before Christmas," Thomson said.

Although there appears to be a great variety of goods being sold on the concourse, there is a four page packet of regulations to which the vendors must adhere, according to the Board of Governors. The packet outlines the priority, by definition, of which groups will get table space and which will not.

According to the packet distributed to all vendor applicants, the first category includes Registered Student Organizations, graduate groups , and Campus Center or Student Union organizations. These groups must only provide information non-profit services.

The last priority is vending conducted by outside organizations with no affiliation to the University. Vendors that fall into this category must demonstrate that their merchandise is unique and is offered at a discount to customers. These vendors pay a $100 fee per day, whereas the first priority group pays nothing for a table.

In addition to priority regulations, there are also goods which cannot be sold due to interests which conflict with the University itself. Food products cannot be sold because they would compete with Food Services and products that are sold by the University Store are also prohibited, according to Thomson.

Happy Holidays and good luck on finals, everyone.

Draft dodgers won't receive financial aid

BOSTON (AP) - Massachusetts college officials say they will have little trouble complying with a new Massachusetts law banning state scholarships to male students who fail to register for the military draft.

The registration requirement becomes law at midnight tonight and goes into effect 90 days later. It affects an estimated $24 million in scholarships and is similar to a federal measure, called the Soloman Amendment requiring that students be registered before receiving federal aid.

"This will have no impact at all on us because we already have to adhere to federal regulations," said Estelle Shanley, spokeswoman for the state Board of Regents of Higher Education. "This is just adding another step."

Students currently must sign a statement stating they are registered with the Selective Service system to qualify for federal funds, Shanley said. A similar state requirement will be in effect by next fall, she said.

Supporters of the bill have argued that students receiving tax dollars to help pay for their college education should be forced to comply with federal law, sign up for the military and help defend their country.

"I filed the bill to give kids a sense of courage, responsibility and honesty," said state Rep. Walter DeFilippi, R-West Springfield. He said Massachusetts has historically been "a leader in patriotism."

Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, a strong opponent of the draft-scholarship aid law, vetoed a similar proposal last year. But this year he decided to avoid further opposition, due in part to a U.S. Supreme Court decision that upheld the federal requirement.

Dukakis and other critics argued the bill is unfair because it affects only males and denies aid to students without a hearing or other due process guarantees. The bill also affects poor students most heavily because well-off students could go to college without state aid and without registering for the draft, they said.

Pressure rises with caffeine

By MINDY ANTONIO
Collegian Staff

Ingesting caffeine before an exam or a similar stressful situation can wreak havoc on the body's cardiovascular system, according to a recent report by a Duke University professor.

By testing 33 male undergraduate students as they took sample exams, James Lane's new study concluded that the combination of caffeine and stress in the body's system raises a person's blood pressure significantly, and intensifies the effects of stress on the heart.

The report, entitled "Caffeine Magnifies Cardiovascular Responses to Sress," found that without caffeine intake, students' blood pressures rose an average of seven points, from 120 over 65 before the exam, to 127 over 72 after the exam.

But after drinking two cups of coffee and then taking the exam the average blood pressure rose more than 10 points, to 135 over 77. Blood pressure of more than 140 over 90 is considered high.

Robin Levin, a University Health Services nutritionist, said high blood pressure is an indication that the heart is working harder. "It puts a strain on the heart and more pressure on arterial walls."

Levin noted, however, that in some cases of high blood pressure, caffeine was not restricted from diets.

Nutritionist Karen Weiner of Health Services said, "I could see it being a problem emotionally, but some people work better under stress. For some, it might make them nervous."

Many recent studies are finding both adverse and positive side-effects related to caffeine intake. Levin said one study found that caffeine helps release free fatty acids that can give the body an extra energy source. "They give it (caffeine)to athletes sometimes."

Some caffeine users have experienced cases of insomnia and heart flutters, Weiner said. "A study done also found that women who had cystic breast were heavy coffee drinkers who drank about six to eight four-once cups a day," she said.

Republican Club will share with MassPIRG

The UMass Republican Club will soon be sharing office space with the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group after the Campus Center Board of Governors granted them office space last night.

The Republican Club was given one-fourth of room 423 in the Student Union Building after one Mass PIRG member spoke against the move. "It is a priority of the national Republican Club to kill 'PIRG'," she said, noting that the Republican Club and Mass PIRG chapter at Williams College, in Williamstown, Mass, had a fight this year.

"Iknow that's not the intent of Steve (Erickson, president fo the UMass Republican Club) but I don't see how we'll be compatible."

Erickson said he felt there would be no problems with Mass PIRG in the new office.

IN other space moves, the Asian Students Association will be able to move into room 415 Student Union Building at the beginning of next semester, said current BOG chairman Roberto Abele.

The BOG also elected a new chairwoman, Jane Donohue, at the meeting. Currently the University Store coordinator for the BOG, Donohue said, "I am not intimidated to deal with the administration."

Retiring professor continues teaching after 37 year career

After 37 years in the classroom associate professor of chemistry George Oberlander has decided to retire at the end of the semester.

Beginning his teaching career at Fort Devons Army Base in 1946 the former Coporal Oberlander is remembered for his service in the U.S. Army as well as in the classroom.

Oberlander later began teaching at the Massachusetts Agricultural College, which would eventually become the University of Massachusetts.

Oberlander enjoys sports in his spare time, and when not traveling likes to work around his Amherst home.

Although retiring, Oberlander does not want to leave the classroom. As a result, he will head a post retirement assignment here next semester.

Married with five children, Oberlander recently celebrated his 40th wedding anniversary. — C.Ron Allen

And now for today's news...

Who could argue that the biggest event of the semester was the Democratic rally for Vice Presidential candidate Geraldine Ferraro? The Oct. 20 rally drew about 20,000 people to the lawn around the Campus Pond, and was covered by most of the region's major media outlets. At the rally, held the day before the second Reagan-Mondale debate, Ferraro claimed it was "a whole new race." But she was wrong. Mondale failed to overpower Reagan in that second debate, and Reagan(shown at an appearance in Boston below) won 49 states in the final election Nov. 6.

Days after the election, international tensions flared over false reports that Nicaragua's Sandinista government had received a shipment of Soviet MIG fighter planes. Arumor spread quickly through campus that U.S. forces had attacked the Soviet ship supposed of carrying the fighters, and many students (below) became concerned at the prospect of escalating conflict.

The University was in the news on both ends of environmental problems this semester. About 30 UMass students (bottem left) helped test Massachusetts lakes, streams and ponds for the Acid Rain Monitoring project here. At the same time, the UMass coal-fired boilers (below), lacking a filtering system, are in violation of the federal Clean Air Act.

Also on campus this semester: the Dalai Lama offered wisdom on spiritual health, grammarian Edwin Newman(lower left) "cringed" at the frequent abuses of the language by the popular media, and UMass students participated in a "die-in" (lower right) to demonstrate their belief that nuclear war is suicide.

Mother takes trip to rescue daughters

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts student will fly to Sr Lanka tomorrow in hope of recovering her two daughter who were kidnapped by her ex-husband on Nov.3.

Rosa Melendez, 25, of 308 University Apartments, said yesterday at a press conference at the Everywoman's Center that she is "trying to keep positive" despite her fears for safety once she is there.

Melendez was awarded custody of Nina, 3 and Klara,6 when she and her husband, Charles Ranasinghe, 28 (a native of Sri Lanka) were legally divorced on Nov.20.

Their six-year old marriage ended due to Ranasinghe's "cruel and abusive treatment."

"His past behavior leads us to believe she will be in danger," Lotis Reyes-Ocasio, co-ordinator of the Third World Women's Program at EWC said.

The Everywoman's Center and Northampton's Neccessities-Necesidades, social service agency for battered women,have enlisted the help of the office of the U.S. Secretary of State and the U.S. Embassy in Sri Lanka to help Melende once she arrives in the small island country off the southern tip of India.

Melendez said she has also received a "very supportive letter" from Gov. Michael Dukakis.

B.J. Fernando, an attorney and former Sri Lankan ambassador to the United States, will take the case once Melendez arrives there. Reyes-Ocasio said Melendez's chance of getting her children back are "good"

Although a child custody decree issued in the United States, generally has no force of effect in a foreign country,' it is possible that a decree issued in the U.S. might be recognized in a foreign country on the basis of reciprocity, citing the international clause of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act.

Fernando handled a similar case in 1983 and won, Reyes-Ocasio said. "We hope (Melendez's) have the same success," she said.

Because the Sri Lankan courts are on holiday vacation, Melendez will not be able to file her case until January 2. Then, it will take up to two weeks, before her case is heard in court.

Melendez said she has talked to Klara since the children arrived in Sri Lanka. She believes their father is emotionally hampering them.

"The man is crazy. If he is not abusing them physically he is poisoning their minds about me," she said.

She said the girls' relationship with their father was one of fear. "They were afraid to be alone with him," she said, especially when the girls kneo he had been drinking or when he and their mother had argued.

Melendez said her ex-in-laws "seemed upset at what he had done." She is under the impression that "they are very happy to have them (the children) there."

Reyes-Ocasio said the issues at hand were not only Melendez's safety, but also legal ones. For example, once the Shri Lankan court rules, locating the children will be a problem because the father could change his location. Also, after finding Ranasinghe, enforcing the court's rule will be problematic.

But Reyes-Ocaiso said, "We strongly feel that if officals in the Sri Lanka are aware that elected officials here are watching the case, more certain that her protection will be made a priority."

She also stressed people should write to Amherst Senator John W. Oliver to help put pressure on the Sri Lankan government.

A support fund has also been established to help deferred the cost of Melendez's trip to and from Sri Lanka. For information please contact the EWC at 545-0883.

Melendez said she is fearful Ranasinghe will torment her if she returns to Amherst with her daughters.

"The only thing I can do is hope," Melendez said.

Anti-apartheid protestors are making an impact

by KIMBERLY BURGE
Collegian Staff

An ad promoting the sale of South African gold krugerrands prompted area residents to protest against local merchants selling the coins.

Local businesses selling the coins are, Paysaver, Holyoke, Northampton and Springfield; Daniel Smith Coin Dealer, Amherst; Bay State Coin Co., Holyoke; Westwood Exchange, Fairfield Mall; Platt Jeweler and Loan Co., Springfield and Chicopee; and John C. Kuleh Insurance, Springfield, according to an ad in The Valley Advocate.

Francis Crowe, the Western Massachusetts representative of the American Friends Service Committee, said the krugerrand is a coin made to help support the racist apartheid government in South Africa.

After talking to the president of Paysaver, and threatening to set up picket lines and hold a press conference, the ad was removed, Crowe said. "He said, they' (Paysaver) weren't selling that many," she said.

Even though she was successful in getting Paysaver to stop its advertisements, she doubts other local businesses selling it follow unless they're pressured to.

"Some of us are committed to make sure people we know won't patronize stores that don't respect human life and human dignity and who support South Africa apartheid," said Esther Terry, UMass Afro-American studies professor. "We are committed," she said.

Over 18 civil rights leaders have been arrested in the past three weeks as part of the Free South Africa Movement an American group which is demanding an end to the apartheid regime in South Africa.

Professor George Wald, a Nobel Prize winning biologist at Harvard University, was arrested on December 5th along with three other men after they refused to leave the Deak-Perara Co., and exchange company in Boston.

In a telephone interview, he said he protested because "South Africa is an intolerable horror show. Blacks are being denied their basic human rights." He also finds intolerable that our government is an ally of the apartheid government.

Wald finds Reagan's "constructive engagement" which says that if the United States divests from South Africa, the South African people will get hurt. "A complete hoax. South Africa has the strongest military on the African continent which endears them to our government," he said.

To help ease the situation in South Africa, "The first thing the United States must do is disengage itself from South Africa. I am dismayed that Harvard or the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) hasn't cut their investments."

STOCKHOLM DEC 13 — GREETS THE YOUNG — Nobel peace laureate Bishop Desmond Tutu of South Africa (r) grabs the hand of a young follower during Thursday's demonstration here in support of his struggle to change the racial laws of his country. Other persons in photo unidentified.

Boston, Dec. 13 — PROTESTING APARTHEID — Tufts University Professor Clyde Taylor is led away in handcuffs by a police officer, Thursday, during a demonstration at the Deak-Perara Co., an exchange office in Boston which trades South African coins. The protestors were demonstrating against apartheid policies in South Africa.

Kwanzaa celebrates Black unity in traditional ways

By CHRISTOPHER R. ALLEN
Collegian Correspondent

In an effort to teach and reaffirm the principles of Black unity and self-determination, Dr. Ron Karenga created "Kwanzaa" in 19 and is still honored by Black people across the nation.

The Afro-American holiday, celebrated from Dec. 26 to January 1 is a celebration of the "first fruits" harvest which comes at the end of the year. In its seven day period, Kwanzaa promotes the seven basic principles honored during this holiday.

Kwanzaa has its roots in cultural nationalism, a part of the Black Liberation ideology which views the reclamation of language, culture and history as central to Black freedom. The rituals and symbols of Kwanzaa are drawn from African heritage as well as the history of Black people in America.

Kwanzaa is a Swahili word meaning first word and is patterned in part after harvest rituals in which people celebrate their fellowship and share the fruits of their labor.

The seven principles are (1) Umoja meaning unity; (2) Kujichagulia which is self-determination; (3) Ujima (Collective Work and Responsibility); (4) Ujamaa-cooperative Economics which is the habit of sharing wealth and resources; (5) Nia meaning Purpose; (6) Kuumba signifies creativity; and Imani which is faith in one's people and struggle.

Various ceremonies are held during Kwanzaa to reaffirm unity and reclaim a stolen past. At one ceremony, for example, newborn babies and people who wish to adopt African names are given new names. The unity of families as well as community is commemorated. Married couples reaffirm their commitment by drinking from the unity cup or kikone.

Gift-giving is wrested from Santa Claus (a white man who has proved to be more generous to rich children regardless of their behavior), and becomes instead a symbol of faith and love between children and parents, as well as instruction in creativity and thriftiness.

Lisa Stephens, a first year UMass student, said, "Kwanzaa, it's the only thing Black people have, it's like their own personal Christmas," Professor Ernest Allen of the Afro-American studies department said that for him "It is a spirit of unity and a time to reflect on the difficulties as well as successes of the past year."

Professor Chester Davis of the Afro-American department believes that the intent of the celebration is not just indiscriminate gift giving; but, to create a sense of unity and brotherhood among Black people.

John Bracey also from the Afro-American studies department said "It is a variable alternative to get Black people to come together in solidarity and express their feelings with live music and sharing of gifts."

They all agreed there's a lot more to Kwanzaa than superficial gift giving. It's a time to lift each other up and give thanks for being a unique culture with a value all its own.

Black Affairs wishes all a Happy Kwanzaa and happy holidays

Praise!

Here I am, a senior at this university. I am majoring in Education, and Human Services. In this particular field of study, we concentrate on all aspects of human behavior.

In listening to and counseling others with their problems, I have done some retrospective thinking about my own behavior. In something as little as showing appreciation, one would be amazed at what a powerful tool positive reinforcement can be.

I read the Collegian almost every day. A lot of time and effort go into its publication, and I appreciate the thought and planning that goes into this school paper. Keep up the good work!

Hugs worked

I am writing in response to Monday's letter by Marguerite Asci, in which she condemned the "Gay Blue Jean Day," and "Hug a Homosexual" booth. She states that these activities "discredited" our cause, and called them "a side show."

Asci failed to mention that numerous pamphlets and articles were available at the booth. These were free to anyone, and they provided insight into the gay lifestyle, along with reasons for the existence of homophobic feelings, and ways to overcome the fear and doubt through listening and understanding. Opening the eyes, ears, and mind are the first steps in overcoming oppressive feelings.

Asci blatantly shows her ingnorance with the statement, "you insult their (people at the University) intelligence by subjecting them to your sexual habits." I stared at this comment with amazement and disbelief. Since when is a hug a display of "sexual habits?" A hug symbolizes bonds of many dimensions, including friendship, strength, happiness, and support. This was not a "public display of affection" according to Asci's definition, but a display of trust, support, and caring.

The "Hug a Homosexual" booth exhibited the utmost respect and dignity, and the participants — all of the participants — deserve congratulations for their devotion and enthusiasm.

Good cheer!

It was bound to happen, and Butterfield started the rebuttal. The issue I'm referring to is the student's objections to the term "Secret Santa."

Santa is a positive frame of mind that shouldn't be voted upon. He represents the holiday spirit, EVERYONE's spirit. I've seen people of all religions watching, singing, and quoting favorite lines from "Rudolph," "Frosty," and "The Grinch." If Santa is viewed as offensive, why then aren't these?

Andrea Griswold said "Santa is a symbol of the Christian religion." This statement is so far from the truth. The Christ child is the symbol of the Christian religion. Santa is a symbol of happiness and joyful festivity.

If the students from Butterfield feel the need to turn holiday festivity into a petty religious argument, that's their concern. I believe that an issue such as this shouldn't be blown out of proportion. Santa is a legend that should be seen just for what he is, a jolly cheer giver, not a religious platform.

SGA President responds

I know it's 1984 but ignorance is not strength. Yet this seems to be the overlying theme of the Collegian Board of Editors editorial on the Student Government Association. I found it very difficult to believe that the editors did not consult the SGA before writing on issues that are obviously outside their realm of expertise.

Within this editorial I was attacked for stalling on the Code of Student Conduct revisions. This document is of paramount importance to every student on campus and has been a priority of the SGA. However, I will not jeopardize 19,000 students' rights in an effort to hastily complete the remaining 5 percent of the document, which is the most crucial in terms of our rights. During intersession, when myself and the other students involved, have the time and energy that this document deserves, is when this important task will be completed.

It was further implied that the SGA has been ineffective. To this I will let the record stand for itself. Since I've been co-president we have helped register over 5000 students to vote, elected five students to town meeting, provided $25,000 worth of student jobs, opened the dining commons for study space, gained two years of funding for six varsity sports teams, added lighting on campus in 20 different locations, put forth the suggested patterns of course conduct to the faculty senate, successfully lobbied against a 15 percent tuition increase, help put the furniture back in Southwest, worked on landscape improvement projects, and done much, much more, for these are things the president's office has been working on. Other people in the SGA have also improved this campus for us all.

Showing affection's okay

I am writing in response to the woman who wrote the negative letter about the "hug a homosexual" booth out by the Hatch on Lesbian and Gay Awareness Day. At first, I thought the booth was a bad idea, too. I was uncomfortable with the idea because I felt that uneducated heterosexuals, who already equate homosexuality with sex rather than love, would surely get a bad impression.

But when I stood by the information table, as my friends handed out leaflets, I saw that the t-shirt with "lesbian" written on it was lying empty. So, in a moment of courage, I put it on. Not long after, I found myself hugging straight people, lesbians, and gay men who had come as supporters. "Thanks, I sure needed a hug," they kept saying.

It had been a tense morning, for people had been very worried that violence would escalate because of threats to hang a gay dummy in effigy, and to demonstrate against us. Everyone had agreed that, even though we were angry, we would not instigate violence. But we were afraid the anti-gay people would. Although, in the end, there was no overt violence, people were still filled with the jitteriness of having not known what to expect. So I was glad to be giving out love and support in the form of free hugs. I even got less nervous myself, even though I was getting stares from unsupportive onlookers.

I now wonder how anyone could interpret a loving hug as something hideous, perverse. The woman to whose letter I am responding said she disapproves of all public displays of affection. If she is speaking the truth, I am sorry for her. Does she mean we ought not hug an aunt or uncle, smile at a friend, touch one's lover affectionately on the arm, or play hopscotch with a little sister? These are all public displays of affection, and joyous ones at that. To hug a friend, a lover, or someone who just feels tense and could use one, shouldn't create a bad impression at all. If it creates a bad impression on you, it is you who should examine your values, not I.

Time is running very short

Kelly McDonald

For the average student, college means four years of school, give or take a semester or two. For all of us UMassers, it means four years in a very scenic area of western Massachusetts. In my first three years here, I was taught to work hard, to put in three solid years of dedication to intense studying. After all, we must be prepared to face "the real world" one day. After over three years of listening to this phrase thrown around by professors, I'd love to know what it is that they think we're doing now. Besides, although college is a lot of fun — the friends, the parties, the atmosphere — There's also a great deal of pressure; pressure to do well in school, decide on a major, make money, and finally, have some time for fun. Before graduation day, we make some pretty heavy decisions regarding the direction of the rest of our lives. I could think of a few better descriptions of fun. Anyway, as I look around, it seems to me that the emphasis is on "getting ready" for life after commencement. We do an awful lot of preparing, but how much living do we do?

How many of us will leave UMass without ever seeing the breathtaking Quabbin Reservoir so close by? Or going for a walk by Puffer's Pond or Mill's Falls? How many students who move off campus to South Amherst even know Mill's Falls exist? When was the last time you took a bike ride through the hills or watched a sunset? Amherst has the best sunsets.

For three years I buried myself in work. Don't get me wrong, I had fun too, but I rarely took time to enjoy the beautiful environment of the Berkshires. I kept putting everything off to my infamous senior year. Well here it is and now it's time to prepare resumes and get ready for interviews, etc. And the clock ticks on.

The whole point is that you have to make time to do some of the things in life that really make you happy and bring you a sense of peace and self. You can become so overwhelmed by the pressures of school and life here. But don't let it blind you from the beauty that surrounds you. And there is so much beauty.

So for all of us working so fiercely "preparing to live," why not make a concerted effort to stop, look, listen and live, just a little bit more...Tomorrow will come soon enough. The clock ticks on. Make it happen.

Stockbridge students are UMass people, too

For some time, the students of the Stockbridge School of Agriculture have been treated in an injust manner by the University of Massachusetts, its students, and policies.

This institution is one of the finest agricultural colleges in the country today. There is top notch education being taught here by some of the most respected and renowned professors and instructors in the field of agriculture throughout the country. We were also the first college on the Amherst campus. However, our school is thought of as nothing more than a club for farmers, and that we do nothing more than play with dirt.

We students use the same facilities as everyone else; we are also eating the same food through the same meal plan at the same dining commons as all the other dormitory residents do and we live with all the rules and regulations as everyone else does who attends this campus. However, when the students of Stockbridge try to go for our four year degree, we have to go through the same orientation hassles that we had to go through when we first came here. We have to miss work or ruin a weekend so we can be here to get acquainted with the school we have been attending for the last two academic years.

We students also run into problems with our transcripts. There are some classes that we have to take that are not transferrable. We also have to complete a five month internship of work in the field in order to graduate from this school. This is not transferrable to the university.

Some of the students also play sports but are unable to play UMass varsity sports because of a National Collegiate Athletic Association rule. The rule states in part that a two year school's students cannot play varsity sports for a four year school.

So what do you say Chancellor Duffey? How about it Dean Dennison? How about doing something about these headaches? Why not make Stockbridge a school with UMass programs, like the School of Management, and the College of Foods and Natural Resources are? A lot of good would come out of the merger of the two schools. The students wouldn't have all of these problems and the two schools could act as one institution instead of two, just to name a couple of benefits.

Now, everybody knows where it is." With the recent declaration of disaster, Ethiopia joins Grenada and the Falkland Islands as new geography in the minds of many. Almost 50 years ago, the world received similar enlightenment as the press covered the impending Abyssinian War, between the forces of Emperor Haile Selassie and Italy's Mussolini.

Abyssinia is now Ethiopia. The war is now against Eritrean seccessionists. The hunger, well...it isn't the first time that this country has been crippled by starvation. The media coverage, however, is what brought it all to our attention.

The circumstances in which news organizations, it has been revealed, apparently withheld world attention from the severity of Ethiopia's plight, have historical reminiscences to them. Press covereage of the Abyssinian War in 1935-6 was generally over-sympathetic to the Emperor's side, creating in many minds the illusion that this impoverished, backward nation could somehow overcome powerful Italy.

In light of Ethiopia's desperation today, how is it that journalists covering the extravagant 10th anniversary celebrations of Lt. Gen. Mengistu Haile Mariam's government just months ago — failed to note the dismal conditions of the country? Could the callousness, that is an occasional occupational requirement for reporters, have overcome their sensibilities?

Ethiopia's Marxist mentors, and earlier, Abyssinia's League of Nations technically should have lent a hand when their client's days looked numbered; it didn't add up that way. The U.S.S.R. seemed slower than the U.S.A. in providing aid. Abyssinia realized too late that the League of Nations was an encumbersome bureaucracy and not much else, least of all possessed of the power to enforce its various mandates.

Colonialism is a common cause, many Third World leaders argue, of their current problems. Ethiopia, however, shares with Afghanistan the trait of never having quite been colonized. Today they remain as two whose systems never quite accepted the Marxist line, and now, for that reason and others, both are in trouble.

Ethiopia has 12 percent arable land, slightly more than Mexico. Its $117 per capita income (on good years) hardly cuts Mexico's $1800, but bear in mind homogenized Mexico's proximity to America's prosperity. Think now of Ethiopia's Balkanized 42 million people (and dropping): six peoples and many more languages, fractured by religion and war, devastated by drought and starvation. The situation, sadly, is not likely to remedy itself soon. Western focus on such events is short-lived; attention is soon diverted by other pressing issues.

The Boston Globe is noted for its competent foreign affairs coverage. Pulitzer prize-winning Globe photographer Stan Grossfeld and writer Colin Nickerson were dispatched to the disaster area. They sent back much material, including a photo which was later reprinted on the cover of the New York Times. On December 3, the date of Time's peculiar white-out on Ethiopian relief, the Boston Globe circulated an eight-page special titled Famine and Flight. Notable in its inclusion is an address list of charities.

The pages are filled, predictably, with visuals of human suffering. On the back are the two reporters, rough-looking from tough living. In their eyes one can almost detect a journalistic zeal, one perhaps affected by a God-likeness inherent from a wade through the sea of inhumanity. Journalists in such situations have to deal with "censorship, bad living conditions, the altitude, the crazy climate and the strain on heart, lungs and nerves." This is what Nickerson and Grossfeld braved in 1984. In 1935, it was what New York Times correspondent Herbert Matthews said.

The Abyssinian War served as a training ground for a generation of foreign war correspondents. These journalists were victims of standard press manipulation, but they endured. Fifteen of them finally entered Addis Ababa with victorious invading Italian forces. True to history, the Italians were later kicked out. True to the profession, the correspondents moved to the next hot spot. Crisis in Abyssinia was soon enough supplanted by uprisings in Morocco and Spain.

The more things change, the more they stay the same. At least people know where these places are. Or do they?

Terror in the Dining Commons

All right," I said, my voice rising. "I want some knives out here now." I never had the nerve to yell into the dishroom for silverware when it was out before.

"Go jump in a lake," a voice said. "We got other things to worry about besides you knives."

After I had my dinner on the tray, I looked and saw my friend Arnie waving to me. I went over and sat down.

"Can I borrow your knife, Arnie?"

"Sure. I've used it, though."

"I'll wait."

"You don't need a knife for pork chops," Arnie said. "I use my hands."

"Did I ever tell you how funny you are?"

"I'm not kidding you. Back in October I got sick of waiting for the silverware so one day I started using my hands. I got sick of relying on other people. This way, I don't have to wait."

"I'd rather wait," I said.

"Really?"

"Listen. If you pick up that pork chop with your hands and eat it, you can have the next one." Arnie picked up one of my pork chops between his thumb and forefinger. Then he pinched the pork chop down and inward, causing the gravy to pool.

"Ouch!" He had let some of the gravy slip down onto the skin between his thumb and forefinger. "I hit a warm spot," Arnie said. "Since I've started to eat this way, I've noticed that the gravy has cool and warm spots, like a lake that's fed by underground springs. The mashed potatoes are pretty consistent, though. They're always very hot so you have to let them cool."

He wiped his mouth. I got up to look for clean knives. There weren't any. There were plenty of clean forks and spoons. I went back to the table thinking about underground springs.

At the table I started to cut my remaining pork chop with the edge of my knife.

"Okay, Dan," Arnie said. That's a good way to do it, too. You aren't relying on anyone else, all the same."

Sound advice

By NEIL O'SHEA
Collegian Staff

The Christmas season is always a good time for record lovers. No, not because of the greedy lust for the new record under the tree, but because of the well-timed promotional campaigns by every label that fill the stores with tons of vinyl.

As usual, the pop and rock market is overflowing with instant stars and pre-programmed best sellers. Cheap techno-pop is the rage these days, so if you're shopping for any pre-pubescents, Madonna's suggestive Like A Virgin or Culture Club's Waking Up With The House On Fire will hit it big with the MTV crowd.

Unfortunately, sound-alike synth bands are also big with a lot of older kids as well. For the high schoolers or collegiates on your list, Welcome To The Pleasuredome by Frankie Goes To Hollywood, Mange Tout by Blancmange or Age Of Consent by Bronski Beat will do the trick quite well for those who like here today/gone tomorrow media stars.

If your gift getters are more discerning about pop music, Christmas for fiscal 1984 is a jackpot.

Nick Lowe's Cowboy Outfit is a genuine rocker, with some of his best stuff since Rockpile. Captain Sensible has a decent greatest gits package called A Day In The Life Of... and U2's Unforgettable Fire is their best seller to date, and justifiably so. Regardless of what most critics say, U2 has refined their act with a little help from Brian Eno's production. All The Rage from General Public is another dumper for critics, but it's actually fun stuff, although a shade too commercial for diehard English Beat fans.

Remember how girl groups allegedly became big in the 80's with the Go-Go's? (I say allegedly because they were there all along) Well, The Bangles now sit in that media niche with All Over The Place, a palatable piece of rock and roll. Another girl group is Wham! and this one is to be avoided. (Remember you'll be home during January and have to listen to all this stuff you give away.)

A big deal for rock and roll these days is revivals. One of the better sixties sound bands is The Del Fuegos whose The Longest Day is old-time rock served up 80's style with enough verve to get them on the cover of every rad music magazine in Boston. Definitely a wise choice.

Moving from rock revivals to rock legends, Too Tough To Die from the Ramones is a scorcher. The title is appropriate; these guys will crank out records until doomsday, and their latest one shows Joey Ramone has learned something about politics. Good stuff.

CINEMASCOOP
by Count Ramin Zahed

The Cinemascoop Ten Best Films of the Year

1. The Killing Fields: a Gandhiesque achievement about the Cambodian ordeal under the Khmer Rouge, very moving and realistic.

2. Amadeus: a picturesque essay on mediocrity and genius which flows magically with the music of Mozart.

3. Places in the Heart: Robert Benton's sensitive account of family ties and the Great Depression; Sally Field Shines.

4. Once Upon a Time in America, the Unedited Version: An epic of a movie in the tradition of The Godfather.

5. Entre Nous: Diane Kurys' film about the friendship of two women during World War II stays on the mind like a French fragrance

6. Country: Jessica Lange, Sam Shepard, a landscape; need I say more?

7. Greystoke; a more human Tarzan for the eighties carrying a strong message of humanity, superbly photographed; the monkeys are the best.

8. The Natural: Robert Redford's comeback to the screen with Malamud's golden summer tale of a baseball hero.

9. Comfort and Joy: Scotman bill Forsyth should be called the king of 'the small movie' with his third masterpiece about the ironies of life, overflowing with charm and humor.

Top of the pile; The Killing Fields

Best Chemistry of 1984: Diane Lane and Richard Gere in The Cotton Club.

10. Splash/All of Me; two happy movies which elegantly brought back the innocent comedy to Hollywood.

Weekend Winners: Opening this weekend at the malls are Dune, The Cotton Club, and Starman. They are all worth seeing once. Also deserving an honorable mention is The Fourth Man which plays at the Pleasant St. Theatre. This excellent thriller is one of the best foreign films of the year. Not recommended to those who are offended by the DePalma school of violence.

Grinch's gift advice

by BRADFORD VERTER
Collegian Staff

Does all this talk of Season's Greetings and good will make you sick? Replace Christmas cheer with Christmas fear; Give that special someone a horror novel this season. Here are some of the year's more blood-curdling books:

Finally out is the long-awaited collaboration between two best-selling craftsmen of terror, Stephen King and Peter Staub: The Talisman (Viking, $18.95). More fantasy than horror, the 646 page epic chronicles pubescent Jack Sawyer's search for the mysterious Talisman- the one thing that can save his dying mother. His quest takes him into an alternate universe where "twinners" exist - malignant inverse images of our mundane plane.

This makes for a fast-paced, exciting story that reads like a Spielberg film. It deals with no great truths; it's pure entertainment. Its parallels with The Wizard of Oz are too obvious to detail. Word has it that film rights have already been bought. No great shock.

To coincide with publiciation of The Talisman, an omnibus edition of Staub's earlier opus has been released. The collection, Wild Animals (Putnam, $18.95), contains two previous novels, Julia and If You Could See Me Now, and one hitherto unpublished, Under Venus.

Under Venus was Straub's second book, and it shows. It involves a young modern composer, Elliot Denmark, who visits his hometown and is forced to deal with relatives, old lovers and friends.

It is competently written, and the background is well enough worked out, but nothing really happens. Straub is dealing with people and emotions, not plot; and there is this nauseating 1960's Let's-all-be-honest-and-deal-with-our-feelings-so-we-can-love-eachother mentality.

If this weren't bad enough, everyone talks with the same voice. This makes the 80-year-old father of Denmark particularly ludicrous. For a good laugh, read his speech on page 528.

In his introduction Straub says the book "drifts toward the gothic". Unfortunately it gets mired in the dull.

One of the good things about the Horror genre is that it motivates smallet publishers to produce works that larger houses are hesitant about. One of these, Scream/Press (P.O. Box 8531 Santa Cruz, CA. 95061) has released Dennis Etchinson's much-anticipated collection, The Dark Country ($15.00).

By the psuedonymous author of the Halloween II and III novelizations, Etchinson's well-crafted stories are chilling.

Particularly those exploiting the terror of organ transplants. These are embellished with equally chilling artwork by J.K. Potter. Recommended only for those who do not have a relative currently in surgery.

Scream/Press also publishes a terrific book by Ramsey Campbell, The Face That Must Die ($12.95). This deeply disturbing book deals with Horridge, a psychotic homophopic killer with a paranoid guilt complex that makes Dostoyevski's Raskolnikov look like Ollie Optimist.

Although it is not without flaws, The Face That Must Die is the sleeper of the season. Accompanied by a short autobiography by Campell, and more photo-collages by Potter, this sleeper will prevent you from sleeping. Highly recommended.

Another small publisher, Whispers Press (70 Highland Ave. Binghampton, NY 13905), has printed a book by the grand daddy of the psychopathic novel, Robert Bloch. Psycho II ($15.00) continues the saga of Norman Bates, happily ignoring the barbarous film version. A masterful book, Psycho II is also highly recommended.

F. Paul Wilson's The Tomb ($19.95) is also published by Whispers Press. By the author of The Keep, this is a tribute to Mundy and the old Yellow Peril writers.

A mad Hindu priest wishes to restore India to its rightful path with the aid of ancestral demons. Investigative entrepreneur Repairman Jack is the only one who can stop him.

Whispers Press also issues a much lauded journal of horror short stories: Whispers. Chock full fo good things, the latest issue is available for $5.00 from the publisher.

As a special deal to Collegian readers, Whispers publisher Stuart Schiff offers a 20 percent discount on all items with the enclosure of this review. Take him up on it.

Undoubtedly the finest of this year's Horror books is The Businessman: A Tale of Terror by Thomas M. Disch (harper & Row $15.95) An uproarious pastiche, The Businessman is to a tale of Terror what J. Alfred Prufrock is to a love song. For those who take their spiritualism lightly.

With careful, callous choosing of an appropriate book, you can ensure that your special someone will have no trouble staying up to meet Santa. You old Grinch, you!

Mercedes McCambridge and Phyllis Somerville presented a stunning production of Marsha Norman's 'night, Mother in the Fine Arts Center Wednesday night.

Hollywood commercialism

CITY HEAT
Directed by Richard Benjamin Starring Clint Eastwood and Burt Reynolds
At the Mt. Farm Cinema

By JIM TAYLOR
Collegian Staff

If you run your thumb down a list of Christmas film releases, you'll find a typically commercial Hollywood piece tagged City Heat. You don't need a film here, just a one-sheet outside the theater door telling you Clint Eastwood and Burt Reynolds appear. In fact, all this movie consists of is ninety percent close shots of Clint and Burt. Throw in a few more of Richard Roundtree, Jane Alexander, Madeline Kahn, Irene Cara.... This is basically two separate films, one with Burt and one with Clint and they bump into one another once in a while.

I hate to be obnoxiously critical, but this piece of celluloid garbage deserves it. It seems that director Richard Benjamin is afraid the fewer close shots of the stars, the less returns at the box office. The box office speaks, but in this case it has bad breath. Benjamin's weak direction left all to the actors in his last two films, but there is no one here to leave anything to. This action-comedy strip was written by Sam O. Brown (Blake Edwards) and Joseph Stinson (Sudden Impact[. Edward has been heading downhill throughout his career, but now I wish Warner didn't cut him.

What does exist of a story consists of finding a Ledger that could nail one Mafioso, while another wants it. Reynolds' (Mike Murphy) partner was killed for acquiring it and he must get it back before one of his bed partners gets bumped. Eastwood (Lt. Speer) wants both Mafiosos dead and thinks Reynold's is tied in with them. He also wants Reynolds' secretary, and takes her out to a fight, and a stake-out.

The only tolerable part of this movie lies in East wood's self parody. He's sick of his typage and pokes fun at the Stranger and Dirty Harry characters. There are many Clintisms throughout that are very funny. Unfortunately, they don't hold up for the ninety minute limit.

Reynolds trips over his own ego as he sleepwalks with the same cigarette and ash stuck to his lip. If Reynolds could make fun of his ego, he would be at least tolerable.

There are a few humerous lines exchanged, but long pauses between them for the audience to laugh. They didn't.

Everything in this film is phoney. The sets look like a Burbank and Universal studio back lot. The costumes are off the rack. The comic-book photography is far from visually stimulating. The action scenes are terribly choreographed. Don't tell me it was meant to be phoney because it's funny, because it isn't. All in all, this production resembles children playing on a studio lot. The music is okay.

Clint Eastwood is one of my favorite contemporary Hollywood producer-directors and I feel sorry for him. Burt Reynolds has a track record for appearing in bad films (both as a box office draw and a good film), while Clint bounces between the two. Clint's next film, Pale Rider, should be worthwhile, if he's consistent. As for Burt, good bye.

If the industry allowed for a careful script rewrite and a competent director, this film could have make it. City Heat is bland, banal, trite, boring, and just not hot.

and heavy, Slip It In by Black Flag will radicalize the unwary very quickly. Another heavy, sort-of-punk band worth listening to is Husker Du. Their latest Zen Arcade will melt your artificial tree in seconds flat.

And to prove that punks can actually mature, This Is What You Want, This Is What You Get from Public Image Ltd. shows Johnny (Rotten) Lydon has grown up in spite of himself and has learned that rhythm means more than two chords. Old time punkers should enjoy Lou Reed's New Sensations which, in combination with his earlier Blue Mask, gives an excellent taste of Reed's current introspective style.

Now let's drift over to snotty, intellectual art rock. Robert Quine and drummer Fred Maher (both ex-Voidoids with Richard Hell and currently in Lou Reed's tour band) have an album called Basic. Definitely a good pick for the discerning listener.

TRIVIA CONTEST -- WIN $5!
Here's this week's C & C Trivia Question: What brewery once had a plant in Willamansett? If you know, write your answer, name, address and phone number on a slip of paper and bring it to C & C before 11 p.m. Saturday, Dec. 22. Winner is chosen by lot from among correct answers, and receives a $5 C & C Gift Certificate.

Local restaurant renovated

Recently renovated, the James H. McManus Restaurant is open twenty-four hours a day Fridays and Saturdays and until 3:00 a.m. during the rest ot the week.

Located next to Super Stop and Shop and the Amherst/Hadley town line, McManus' serves beer and wine until midnight every evening and is a popular dining spot for a mixed clientele.

"We have students, families, and University faculty and staff in here. McManus' is popular among fraternities and sport teams as we can accomodate large groups," said Unit Manager Neil Cassidy.

Aside from an all-day breakfast menu, McManus' features dinner entrees of steak, chicken, pork, chops, fish, and scallops served with a roll and salad. "We're introducing some new items like barbecued beef ribs, which should please students," Cassidy said. Ice cream and desserts are also available.

Renovations like new carpeting have upgraded the restaurant. "McManus' used to be sort of a coffee shop," Cassidy said, "but now we are a full-fledged restaurant."

Collegian positions open for spring semester:

Associate Managing Editors
Copy Editors
Layout Technicians
Photo Technicians
Production Supervisors
Associate News Editors
Associate Women's Issues Editors
Associate Sports Editors
Associate Black Affairs Editors

Deadline for applications is Monday, Dec. 17

The Collegian comes out every day of classes because of the efforts of a lot of very dedicated people. It may look like a small paper, from 12 to 24 pages, but it is put together by people who are also trying to pass a full schedule of classes and maybe have a little social life on the side. Or maybe a lot of social life. Any way, thanks to all those who keep us going, day after day.

And our sincere best wishes to the University community this holiday season. Good luck with finals, everyone.

Winter Session

DCE DIVISION OF CONTINUING EDUCATION UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AT AMHERST

UM Swimmers lose to Chiefs

The University of Massachusetts' men's swim team, riddled with injuries and illnesses, finished off the semester Wednesday night failing to a powerful Springfield College, 66-47 at Springfield.

The high point of the meet for UMass came from Mike Minutoli, who came from two lengths behind to win the 200 yard butterfly in 2:01.88.

The Minutemen got off to a good start, placing first and second in the 400 medley relay with the team of Marc Surrette, Tony Baker, Chris Clarke and John Geanocopoulus taking top honors.

UMass' Craig Fuller swam a 4:54.18 to take first in the 500 freestyle. The Minutemen took their only one-two finish in the 200 breaststroke, with Baker placing first and Fred Marius in second disadvantage. He strikes fear into opposing coaches with his size and, let's call it a lack of tact, when he goes to the boards.

The Pats should draft Doug Flutie. Eason hasn't impressed me and what has he done in the pressure games? They need a little excitement in Foxboro and Doug will provide it.

After he leads a Cotton Bowl romp. The other bowls? Oklahoma 35, Washington 13; Ohio State 10, USC 7; Nebraska 45, LSU 20; and Miami 106, UCLA 105 on a last second pass by Berine Kosar to Eddie Brown. They deserve it.

The Holiday Bowl? Michigan 21, BYU 20. Bye number one, remember what the Wolverines did to Kosar and Miami. Six interceptions and a loss early in the year. They play good pass defense.

Gary Carter for Hubie Brooks may be a big steal if Carter keeps his ego out of the Met's clubhouse. Think about it. Hernandez, Strawberry, Wilson, Foster and Carter in a batting order. And the ex-Expo can certainly help the Met's young pitchers develop.

Winter Awards Department: Best male athlete: Football's Bob Simeone. He broke numerous UMass receiving records despite double coverage. Female Athlete: the entire women's soccer team. They're are only true national power. Definite future national champs.

Ouch! Image being run into by both George Ramming (6-6, 220) and Tom Emerson (6-9, 225). Donald Russell knows what it's like. It happened at the BU game. Throw Bobby Braun in there and they could take on the Wild Samoans in a no-holds barred match.

Finally, thanks to the entire sports staff, photogs, graphics and Johnny O, the big man down these parts along with Gentleman Jim Shanahan. But until you walk out of JR's with Laura and Nancy, you haven't lived. Happy Holidays all.

Forward Tom Emerson has seen 54 minutes in four games but has scored only two points and gathered in nine rebounds, unimpressive stats, but Gerlufsen feels the 6-9 junior may play a big role in the game.

"Tom has an affect," Gerlufsen said. "He may start against Northeastern in the other forward spot. He has a good shot."

Ronnie Young and Darryl Carter have been seeing action in that position, but both are mired in shooting slumps (both are under 37 percent from the floor).

MINUTEMEN MUTTERINGS: During Intersession, UMass will face Duquesne, Rutgers, St. Joseph's and St. Bonaventure at "home"...UMass has a 28-13 lead in the series with NU...The Huskies have only two seniors on the team...UMass faces the ACC's Clemson in the first round of the tournament...Scott Hood was named Streeter and Smith "Manager of the year" last week. The vote was unanimous.

Minutemen face big test against NU

Gerlufsen hopes to shake woes with victory over powerful Huskies

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team has a lot to prove, and a tough team to prove it against.

Northeastern University invades the Springfield Civic Center for a 2 p.m. game tomorrow against UMass, losers of three straight, the last being a 71-70 triple overtime loss to Boston University.

The Huskies, 3-1, are a potent high scoring club with good talent on the open floor and a habit of throwing multiple defenses at its opponents.

The Minutemen, 2-3, could be 4-1 in the opinion of coach Ron Gerlufsen, but instead need a victory to go into the Music City tournament in Nashville in two weeks on a positive note.

"We have played good basketball, no doubt about that," Gerlufsen said. "It's just that for a variety of reasons we've blown leads or failed to finish comebacks."

Gerlufsen was quick to point out that the Civic Center hasn't exactly been the cozy little gym under renovations that The Cage was.

"It's like playing on a neutral court," the coach said. "You can actually hear individaul people yelling out things. At The Cage, we had a feeling of warmth and were motivated by the fans. At Springfield we have to motivate ourselves and there's no negative feelings toward our opponents. It's tough."

Only 1851 attended the BU game and seemed lost in the 8,000 capacity Civic Center. Final exams and transportaiton problems may be to blame, but the Minutemen definitely need to look within to have a chance against the Huskies.

Northeastern made the NCAA tournament last season before losing in the second round to Virginia Commonwealth on a last second shot. Despite losing the high scoring Mark Halsel, NU returns a trio of sophomores that inflict their share of damage.

Forward Reggie Lewis, guard Andre LaFleur and reserve forward Wes Fuller have lead a couple of 100 point rampages for the Huskies this season. Lewis is averaging 21 points-per-game. Forward Quinton Dale is the leading rebounder with 12.8 per game. The other starters will come from either the 6-9 Gerry Corcoran , 6-8 Kevin McDuffie or John Williams, a 6-2 guard.

Although small, coach Jim Calhoun's Huskies are very quick and look to run almost every time they touch the ball.

"We (the North Atlantic Conference) and UMass (the Atlantic 10 Conference) both use a 45 second clock which helps us," Calhoun said. "But Ronnie (Gerlufsen) doesn't want to use it. We'll run 'em anyway. We're better than BU in that our offense is more controlled and we get a better shot."

Calhoun said that the Minutemen are one of the better teams NU will face and that he respects the UM starting lineup.

"(Horace) Neysmith, (Bobby) Braun, (Carl) Smith and (Donald) Russell are all tough to guard and they can score," Calhoun said.

"We're not looking at this as an automatic W, the records are meaningless because the only good team we played (Montana) we lost to, and they should have a better record but felt some pressue late in the games. It should be a good game."

A lot of pressure has come on the Minutemen's free throw shooting. Gerlufsen is taking a psychological approach to UMass' 61 percent average from the stripe.

"We just have to loosen up and take the shots," Gerlufsen said. "We're very tight and we're making mistakes that cost us. Each player has to settle down and just shoot the ball."

man-to-man pressure against NU. Russell (17.4 ppg) and Neysmith (13 ppg) are being looked on for scoring along with Smith (8.4 ppg) who is recovering from tendon problems in his right hand. Braun (9.8 and 8.2 rebounds) scored 17 against BU and has looked solid in every game.

Women's hoop shoots past UConn, 63-54

By JOHN A. NOLAN
Collegian Staff

Juanita Matthews scored 13 of her game high 21 points in the second half as the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team defeated the University of Connecticut, 63-54 last night at Amherst College.

Both teams came out scoring with UMass jumping out to a 15-12 lead thanks to an explosive eight point performance by Karen Fitzgerald in the opening eight minutes.

"We told Karen that if the team was ever going to get anywhere, she would have to get more aggressive," UMass head coach Barbara Stevens said.

After sporting the Minutemen a 22-15 advantage, the Huskies closed the gap to 24-20, holding UMass scoreless for five minutes and nine seconds. Barbara Hebel's layup at the 7:06 mark broke the UMass cold spell, sparking the Minutemen to a 10-4 run. UMass led 35-30 at the half.

Matthews came out of the locker room in the second half, scoring six of the Minutemen's first 10 points, as UConn was outscored 13-4. The Huskies threatened midway through the second half behind four consecutive baskets by 6-2 senior forward Leigh Curl, but found themselves lacking enough firepower to catch the Minutemen.

"The best thing about the game was that we maintained the lead when we were pressured," Stevens said. "We were patient when we had to be. Whenever a team has made a run at us, we've responded by playing defensive instead of picking up our intensity."

Particularly pleasing to Stevens was the performance by sophomore guard Mary Marquedant who, in place of Matthews, ran the offense.

"It dawned on me last week that when Mary (Marquedant) ran the second team, everything went smoothly," Stevens said. "We may have found the missing link on offense."

Some final thoughts...

Peter Abraham

One semester as sports editor is over...I never thought I'd live to see it. Back in September when page layout was more foreign than Spanish class and I had trouble remembering who was covering cross country this day seemed pretty far off. But here I am... and I'm crying myself to sleep over the plight of the New York Knicks. Bill Cartwright is out for the year and so is the playoffs for the one man band. I don't care of they beat the Sixers, show me standings in March.

The UMass basketball team is better than last year's team. They may be 2-3 but play better defense and move the ball better on offense. Their problem is that they aren't used to playing with a lead. They were beating UConn, Hartford, and BU before memories of nine win seasons returned and they folded like paper. They can beat Northeastern and Donald Russell and Horace Neysmith are both 20 point-a-game scorers.

But be most impressed with Bobby Braun, the former sixth man is playing 30-plus minutes a game, scoring 10 points and getting ten boards, despite a height

LULL BEFORE THE STORM— The serenity and solitude that landscaped the Whitmore and Herter Hall area changes drastically today when more than 20,000 students return for the spring semester.

BOG dissolved in plan to combine trust funds

By GREG BROWN
Collegian Staff

Student input into the operation of the Campus Center/Student Union complex may be nearly eliminated under a plan to combine the trust funds of the Campus Center, Conference Services, and the University's dining commons.

The plan to form an Auxiliary Enterprises Trust Fund would eliminate the 32-member Campus Center Board of Governors (BOG), replacing it with a 16-member Auxiliary Services Board comprised of faculty, staff, alumni, and students, the director of Auxiliary Services said.

Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance John L. DeNyse met with Auxiliary Services Director Ashoke Ganguli and officials of the Campus Center Administration Dec. 21, he said, and announced the trust fund consolidation Dec. 26.

DeNyse denied that he called the meetings at that time to intentionally exclude students from the decision making process, adding "But you'll never get anyone to believe that."

Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey said, "I don't think there was any conspiracy. If anybody is responsible for the timing (of DeNyse's decision), it's me," he said, explaining that his trip to Argentina at the end of last semester kept DeNyse waiting for him.

Duffey said because of student concerns, he was suspending any final action on the proposal until March 15. "I hope there will be time for students to prepare alternative proposals," he said.

Leaders of the BOG and the Student Government Association (SGA) were irate last week as they attended meetings with DeNyse and Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis L. Madson, primarily to negotiate the financing of programs in the Campus Center.

"We're not against the trust fund consolidation, but this is just a convenient way for them to get rid of us," BOG chairwoman Jane Donohue said.

Campus Center Director William M. Harris refused to disclose the details of discussions between himself and the office of Administration and Finance. He said, "I am against any removal or restructuring of student input into this building."

Rumors flooding the Campus Center throughout the intersession that jobs would be lost because of the merger were denied by Harris, Ganguli, and DeNyse. "There will be absolutely no layoffs of any Campus Center staff people because of this," DeNyse said.

Instead, the positions will slowly be eliminated by attrition, DeNyse said. Attrition is the loss of personnel due to causes other than dismissal, such as death or retirement.

The proposal to consolidate the trust funds would eliminate the $84 Campus Center fee, which pays the debt service of the building and supplies the BOG's annual $134,000 budget. The debt service is "like a mortgage on the building," Ganguli said.

The money for the BOG, which funded programs such as the Craft Shop, the Student Union Art Gallery, Governor's Program Council and Union Program Council, may be transferred to the Student Activities Trust Fund.

Bus service, traffic back at CC Circle

The Campus Center Way and Campus Center Circle have been reopened to traffic, restoring the original access route to the campus parking garage from Commonwealth Avenue.

Buses formerly stopping at Haigis Mall in front of the Fine Arts Center will now stop at the Campus Center Circle. These include: Peter Pan service to Springfield and Boston, Greenfield-Montague, Five College buses to Northampton and Mount Holyoke, and the Campus Shuttle. The shuttle and Five College buses will continue to stop at the southeast corner of Haigis Mall on Massachusetts Avenue.

The Campus Center Way was closed in 1983 to make way for construction work on a filtration "bag-house" for the UMass power plant, which has been cited for violation of the Clean Air Act since 1977. Enough of the work has been completed for the contractor building the bag-house to remove trailers and equipment which were blocking the road.

The UMass Minutemen Marching Band were among the guests invited to partake in Reagan's exclusive inaugural ceremonies.

UM band tunes up at Reagan's party

By DEBORAH BRUNO
Collegian Correspondent

A canceled parade and sub-zero temperatures in Washington D.C. last week did not prevent the Minuteman Marching Band from participating in President Reagan's inaugural ceremonies.

Because the Inaugural Parade down Pennsylvania Avenue was canceled, the 225-member marching band, along with other exclusively invited guests, attended a ceremony to honor President Reagan at the Capital Centre in Landover, Md.

"It didn't make up for it (the canceled parade), but it was a nice attempt," said Nick Wankowicz, a senior trumpet player. "We were all excited that we were part of a little bit of history being made."

Despite the frigid weather, the band was still able to play at three of five scheduled performances including opening the Inaugural Pageant when the UMass band was the only college band to play.

Although some band members felt it was a disappointment not to be in the parade, they said it was a relief to be indoors. While taping a segment for "Good Morning America" in the "D.C. Blizzard," as one member described it, the band members' instruments froze after a few minutes of being outside. None of the band members suffered from frost bite.

This was the second time the UMass Marching Band attended the inaugural events. In 1981, band member marched in Reagan's first Inaugural Parade and were featured in a concert on the steps of the Capital. Although last week's trip was different from the earlier one, McGee said it was still "the ultimate experience for any band member."

Farmer Fred Wentworth's 12 acres of land in South Amherst may become the site of a 300 foot radio tower.

Residents oppose proposed antenna

Air Force plan to build nuclear emergency radio discussed

By LESLEY CLARK
Collegian Staff

Some Amherst residents have taken aim against a U.S. Air Force plan to build a 300-foot radio tower within the town, to transmit signals to other locations in the event of a nuclear attack.

Objections to the proposal, related to the security of the facility, possible fiscal implications, and town resistance to the plan, were raised at Board of Selectmen meetings earlier this month.

Richard Minear, a board member, raised concerns that the tower, as large as the UMass tower library, might be a target of anti-nuclear protests.

"The potential for mischief is enormous," Minear said. "Police costs for preserving a standing tower could pose a budget problem."

Lt. Col. Dale Condit of the Air Force informed the selectmen that the town would be responsible for any police expenses related to the facility. He added that there will be "prudent vandalism protection" supplied by eight-foot high chain link fences topped with barbed wire surrounding the facility. Minear said he felt the fence would not be sufficient.

Questions were also raised about the "appropriateness" of placing the system in a town that has consistently taken a stand against the nuclear arms build-up.

"The system only comes into play after a heavy nuclear attack, and that is, in effect, planning for nuclear war," Minear said.

The Air Force should be aware that in 1982 Amherst had rejected the federal civil defense crisis allocation plan, and had adopted a resolution that declares Amherst to be a nuclear-free zone, he said.

Francis Fortino, a sponsor of the Nuclear Free Amherst by-law, (which was vetoed by Attorney General Francis X. Bellotti) and a member of the Amherst Disarmament Coalition, said the proposed system, operable only after a nuclear attack, represents "a challenge to the principles of the free zone."

The tower is a part of a $122 million national communications system that will cover the northeastern part of the country. Termed Ground Wave Emergency Network (GWEN), it is designed to provide communication between defense posts after a nuclear war, said Les Levenson, a spokesman at Hanscom Air Force Base in Bedford.

Radio transmissions are bounced off the atmosphere, but in the event of a nuclear blast, the atmosphere would be disrupted, making normal radio transmission impossible. The tower and its underground copper antenna are designed to provide communication after a nuclear attack by sending radio waves along the surface of the earth.

The Air Force is considering whether to purchase a 12-acre site on Stanley Street in South Amherst, owned by farmer Fred Wentworth, for the facility.

Placement of the facility in a residential area was questioned, but Town Counsel Robert Ritchie said the government is exempt from town zoning laws.

The Board of Selectmen met last night to discuss the plan before submitting their decision to the Air Force on whether to accept the proposal. Further discussion on the plan is scheduled for Feb. 12 between the Air Force, The U.S. Department of Defense, and Hampshire County commissioners.

Gays' demands get attention of school officials

By JOHN YONCE
Collegian Staff

A part-time gay awareness advocate position, increased faculty involvement and at least one heterosexual sexism awareness colloquium are among the compromises reached over intersession by University of Massachusetts administrators and members of the gay and lesbian community in response to a two-page list of demands presented to the administration in December.

Those demands were made after several homophobic acts occurred on campus, including a bomb scare at a People's Gay Alliance Dance, homophobic slurs written on a poster advertising gay and lesbian awareness day and signs reading "gay busters, we're coming next semester."

"It's a good start but I see it only as a start," said John Jablonsky, president of the PGA and one of the students who presented the demands to the administration last semester.

Jablonsky said he did not know if further action was planned to gain complete satisfaction.

A group of "concerned gays, lesbians and bisexuals," including Jablonsky, met with Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey Jan. 8, Jablonsky said. At that time, Jablonsky said Duffey announced he was putting Dennis L. Madson, vice-chancellor for student affairs, in charge of handling the issue. The group then met with Madson and his staff several times later in the month, Jablonsky said.

The original request for administrative action included demands for the establishment of an office of lesbian, bisexual and gay concerns, to provide sensitivity training, which was not met; the hiring of a heterosexism awareness trainer for the Southwest Residential Area (the East Side living areas already have one); funding for a temporary position in the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) for the same until the Student Government Association can afford to hire one, and the expansion of library resources to include selections relevant to gay people.

Jablonsky termed the meetings with Duffey and Madson as "highlights in terms of frustration." He said his group did not get as much as it wanted from the administration.

Sarah Boy, special assistant to the vice-chancellor of Student Affairs outlined the gains for the gay community as:

- One half-time professional position working with the PGA, the Counseling Collective, and Sexual Orientation Services Committee in Human Relations. This position will be funded in part by the Office of Student Affairs and by the Undergraduate Student Senate. Funding for the proposal was approved by the coordinating committee of the SGA, subject to approval by the senate.
- A heterosexism trainer in the Southwest Residential Area, to be funded by the administration.
- A course to be taught in the Orchard Hill Residential College titled "Lesbians and Gay Men in U.S. Society, 1950-1980s".
- Madson has written to the Commission on Civility and Human Relations to request increased faculty involvement in heterosexism awareness.

SGA committee vote backs gays' demands

By JOHN YONCE
Collegian Staff

Several committees at the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association were active and conducted business as usual during intersession.

The coordinating committee of the SGA, responsible for making decisions for the undergraduate student senate when it's not in session, met four times in January, Chris Sullivan, speaker of the senate, said.

Pending senate approval, the committee transferred $1,100 from the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy to partly fund a half-time gay and lesbian awareness position. The administration will fund the other half. The senate voted Oct. 17th not to fund a full time campus-wide gay/lesbian awareness educator.

"It didn't pass earlier because we were short on money," Sullivan said. "It's just a transfer of funds from payroll savings."

The committee also voted, after "lots of discussion," to endorse the demands of members of the gay and lesbian community made to the administration last semester, Sullivan said.

The SGA Public Policy Committee has created a new draft of a bill that would allow a student to sit on the state Board of Regents of Higher Education and it "looks like it has a better chance than ever," Stacy Roth of public policy said. Roth said that she and others have lobbied state legislators and "they're starting to support it openly."

A similar bill submitted by the State Student Association failed earlier this year when it was submitted as a rider on a bill that "got buried when quorum was called," Roth said.

The Academic Affairs Committee has finished research into the housing overcrowding problem at the University and has submitted a proposal to Housing Services Director Joseph Zannini, Roth said. The proposal includes a short-term recommended solution involving redesigning the swing space program and a long-term program involving major policy changes, she said.

The first meeting of the senate will be tomorrow night.

Television news: too much on image

Ex-TV anchor fights sexism

By TOM MIDDLETON
Collegian Staff

Former television journalist Christine Craft, in a commencement address at Hampshire College's mid-year ceremony, urged 90 graduating students to fight for social justice and to be aware of television's emphasis on image rather than substance.

Craft, 40, is suing Metromedia Inc., owners of the station where she once worked, on charges of discrimination and fraud. Craft was demoted from her position as co-anchor of the KNBC-TV evening news after being told that she was "too old, too unattractive and not sufficiently deferential to men."

"Don't ever lose the ability to have a sense of outrage and social injustice," Craft said at the Jan. 19 commencement. "I don't believe in the trickle-down effect of civil rights."

In August of 1983, Craft was unanimously awarded $500,000 by a jury of six but that decision was overturned by the judge. In a second trial, Craft was awarded $325,000 but appeals by Metromedia have kept the case in court and she has not received any of the money awarded her.

The trend toward emphasizing image rather than substance in television news, Craft said, "disturbs me because it is a trend that says to men and women that the most important thing is to be pretty, to be warm and cuddly." She added, "the entire emphasis the whole time I was there (KMBC-TV) was on appearance. My job as a reporter has never been to make you feel warm and cuddly."

While co-anchor at KMBC-TV, Craft was paid $35,000 a year while her male counterpart earned $80,000 a year.

Craft said she accepted the invitation to speak at Hampshire after senior Tara Nelson interviewed her for her senior project, a video documentary titled "Women in Television News: A Special Interview with Christine Craft."

"She (Nelson) instinctively knew the implications of my case and I wondered what kind of school this student came from," Craft said.

Hampshire College, which opened in 1970, awards bachelor's of arts degrees to students completing a highly individualized non-traditional program in which no grades are given.

BLACK AFFAIRS

Time to celebrate Black history

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

World renowned author, educator, historian, actress and producer, Maya Angelou will highlight this year's Black History Month celebration at the University of Massachusetts with a lecture at Bowker Auditorium on February 25.

Lectures, rededication of the Augusta Savage Art Gallery and the Malcolm X Center, a graduate school fair, a doll workshop, cultural performances and several films and videos will also be presented.

In addition, Paul Robeson Jr., an outspoken social and political activist will lecture on "What Happened to the Civil Rights and Black Power Movements."

An exhibition of the Phillis Wheatley Poems will be on display at the Special Collection and Rare Books Reading Room of the Tower Library. Wheatley was the first Black woman to publish poems in North America and the third woman to publish anything in the United States.

The 1985 theme for the event is "The Struggle for Freedom: The Past, Present and Future".

Maya Angelou, actress, producer, writer and historian will lecture at Bowker Auditorium on Feb. 25 as part of Black History Month.

Valerie Singleton, a member of the Black History Month planning committee said this year's theme was chosen to make a connection between the decade of the '60s and the '80s.

Singleton, a political science/legal studies senior said the month is full of pride and awareness of what Black people have done.

"It sparks an initiative to better oneself," she said.

Black History Month was first celebrated on February of 1926 by Dr. Carter G. Woodson, director of the Association for the Study of Afro-American Life and History.

The celebration's objective is to commemorate the past achievements and present status of Black Americans. As founder, Woodson wanted the world to see Blacks "as a participant, rather than a lay figure in history."

Black History Month is a time for Black America and White America to remind themselves of the contributions and successes that has been made by Blacks in the past," said Pamela Westermoreland, a junior education student.

OTWA to offer an array of programs

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

Holding a fundraising party to aid famine-stricken countries, publishing a monthly newsletter, expanding its resource library, encouraging students to partake in business, launching a student's citizen involvement project and holding an annual human rights breakfast will be among the programs and activities planned for the spring of '85 semester by the Office of Third World Affairs at the University of Massachusetts.

Sherwood Thompson, OTWA director, said he is excited about the semester.

Despite being an "extremely busy and intense semester," Thompson said last fall was a "very productive semester" whereby five new programs were implemented.

During his first full year as director, Thompson said he deviated from advocating for Third World causes, as his predecessors had done, and concentrated on implementing new programs.

Explaining this semester's programs, Thompson said the citizen involvement project will allow students to engage in community volunteer work in such areas as civic affairs, voter registration and government agencies.

Through the purchase and donation of books, OTWA will make a wide range of books available to students for research or class work.

The annual human rights breakfast will be a fund-raising event in which national and international human rights concerns will be discussed. Once a consensus is reached, an appeal will be developed and released to the University and to state Legislature.

An important part of this semester will be encouraging the establishment of more Third World student controlled businesses, Thompson said. Although there are already several people who sell their products to acquaintances, the general student population is not aware of these services.

Thompson added he would also encourage Third World students to participate in the Second Curriculum Program, whereby students' extra curricular activities are recorded and kept on file in the Student Activities Office. This listing is mailed out with the transcript to prospective employers and graduate schools.

"It will enable students to project their lives in a more organized and well-planned fashion," Thompson said.

He said he hopes to continue holding the leadership development workshops that began last fall. The workshop, which gathered student leaders to exchange information and skills pertaining to their jobs, were "very helpful," he said.

In addition to offering the workshops on a weekly time schedule, Thompson said he intends to involve more residential staff workers as well as students working in departments other than student activities.

The workshops' objective is "to help trainees develop an awareness of their combined roles at the University as a community development advocate," he said.

The workshop teaches students how to become more sensitive to the needs of interpersonal groups and the community, how to assess students' specific needs, how to plan and conduct organizational meetings, and how to be aware of priority issues related to student interest, he said.

Renovations: Some completed, more to come

Carpets replaced in CC

Campus Center administrators contracted an outside firm to replace carpets last week in six first-floor conference rooms at a cost of $12,000 to $14,000.

Campus Center Director William Harris said the work was on schedule and that it would be completed before most students return for classes.

Dudley Bridges, building operations manager, said the original carpets in the rooms were torn.

"The carpets had been there since the building was opened in about 1970," he said.

"Our aim is to go into every meeting room and whatever needs to be done, we do," Bridges said. However, "The roof leaks have delayed some of the renovations," he added.

Roof leaks have plagued the Campus Center in the past, but a major repair that will solve the problem has been planned.

"The building authority is scheduled to fix the building's membrane this spring," he said. The membrane is the ceiling above the concourse level of the Campus Center.

Buildings refurbished

Freshly painted walls and cleaner hallways await students taking classes in the Graduate Research Center and Machmer Hall this semester, the latest step in a campus-wide effort to clean up the classrooms, University of Massachusetts Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey said.

The clean up of classroom buildings began last year when Herter Hall was refurnished and painted, and Duffey said eventually all of the older buildings on campus will be cleaned, refurbished and painted.

"Lots of the buildings are in dire need of work and we hope to clean them all up eventually," Duffey said.

He asked for the cooperation of students and others in helping the Physical Plant to keep the buildings clean, particularly the walls, which have been "defaced" in recent years.

UM budget earmarks $2.5 million for repairs

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts is "close to executing" a building contract to repair the University Tower Library as part of a plan to regain full use of the library, according to the director of facilities planning.

H.J. Littlefield said that work may soon begin on a covered walkway from the Tower that would increase the number of safety exits and allowable occupancy.

About $2 million was allocated in last year's capital outlay budget for the repair project that includes the walkway, elevator improvements and the relocation and reshelving of the main collection of books and documents. A tentative completion date for the summer of 1986 has been set for the project.

Other campus building projects now being considered are a multi-purpose sports arena, a polymer science facility, the repair of the Southwest Residential Area steampipes, and a physical plant addition with new coal-fired boilers.

Littlefield said the University has received some "preliminary money" for the addition, but that more funding would be required. The need for the new boilers is critical, Littlefield said.

The UMass Bond Authority is also studying the feasibility of a new sports arena and a proposed $20 million polymer science center. Three million dollars has been appropriated for the sports arena, but Littlefield said that while the University can build an ice rink for that amount, "you can't build a multi-purpose sports facility."

Career services are grouped

By DEBORAH BRUNO
Collegian Correspondent

A career complex in Fraternity-Sorority Park opened last week, bringing together offices that will assist students with career preparations.

University Placement Services, the Office of Cooperative Education, and the Veteran's Assistance and Counseling Service became part of the new University Career Center so that the offices will be more attractive to student and recruiters, Larry Benedict, dean of Academic Support Services, said.

Benedict said the offices were moved to provide students with improved facilities and a better understanding of the services.

"Students will be able to understand the whole concept of the services right from the time they are first-year students," he said.

The services were moved to the center because the old offices were not good enough, Benedict said.

"It was bad exposure and we weren't keeping up with the competition."

Now that the offices are in the renovated building off East Pleasant Street, they will be more efficient, better equipped to handle students, and larger, he said.

He also said that employees are happy with the move because there is more space, but are concerned that the complex is not on the center of campus. But Benedict said he sees no problem, because the new location really is closer for at least half the students.

People with cars will also benefit from the move because Benedict said a big advantage is plenty of parking space. He also said that a career center bus shuttle service is operating.

The Office of Cooperative Education is available to help students obtain professional positions at top companies before they graduate, offering career counseling and resume construction services. Placement services helps students set up interviews with job recruiters and offers career counseling as well.

The Veteran's Assistance and Counseling Service is available to aid veterans and their dependents with counseling and job application assistance.

Admissions merges

By GREG BROWN
Collegian Staff

A new director of undergraduate admissions is being sought to supervise the combination of the offices of freshman and transfer admissions.

Dean of Academic Support Services Larry G. Benedict said his goal is to fill the new administrative position by Aug. 1. Assistant Dean Timm Rinehart is the interim director of undergraduate admissions.

Although the Office of Freshman Admissions and the Office of Transfer Admissions occupy the same office in Whitmore, they are two separate staffs that are currently being merged.

"We have a lot of competition with other schools for the director's position," Benedict said. He said Tufts University and the University of Connecticut were among the colleges looking for an admissions director.

The undergraduate admissions position was vacated in December by David Taggart.

The nationwide search will begin in two weeks with the deadline for applications being "sometime in late March," Benedict said. He said many people who plan on applying are currently employees of the University.

The combination of the two offices is part of Benedict's planned streamlining of the admissions and recruitment process.

"The offices have been physically together for three or four years. Now we want to upgrade and increase the admissions facility, maybe even get our own building. I'd like someplace receptive and hospitable," he said.

The Registrar's Office and the Scheduling Office are also being combined, he said.

DOONESBURY — By Garry Trudeau

GOT A CASUALTY COUNT BACK THERE, VINNIE?
OFFICER, DO YOU THINK WE'LL BE ON TELEVISION?
A FEW BRUISES, SARGE. DOESN'T LOOK LIKE ANY ONE WAS HIT.
WE SHOWED 'EM, THOUGH!
IF WE'RE GOING TO BE ON TV, I GOTTA CALL HOME.
ANYONE KNOW HOW MANY SHOTS WERE FIRED?
MAYBE 40. 50. 70?
50 SHOTS AND NO ONE WAS HIT?
THEY WERE ALL WARNING SHOTS.
WE'RE NOT ANIMALS, YOU KNOW
GBTrudeau

BLOOM COUNTY — By Berke Breathed

HE WAS GONE. BACK UP TO THE CORPORATE OFFICES WHENCE HE CAME. BUT HE, THE CHIEF PROGRAMMER, HAD RENEWED ME FOR ANOTHER SEASON.
YES, WITH BETTER CHARACTER DEVELOPMENT AND A MORE MEANINGFUL PLOT LINE, MY LIFE WOULD BE GUARANTEED AN EXTENDED RUN.
BUT QUALITY HAD TO BE MAINTAINED, HE SAID. OR ELSE! OR ELSE WHAT? I ASKED... OR ELSE THE EVIL...THE UNHOLY, THE UNSPEAKABLE WOULD BE ORDERED UPON ME...
..A LAUGH TRACK!
THE HORROR... THE HORROR!

GORDY — By Gorde

SALUTATIONS, U.MASS! GOOD LUCK ON THE NEW SEMESTER! DIG THE NEW TITLE! GORDY WITH A Y! A BIT EASIER TO PRONOUNCE HI GORDE! GORDY! I'D LIKE TO WELCOME YOU ALL BACK...
SMACK
HI GORDE! GORDY! ...AND HOPE YOU WELCOME ME, TOO.
SWIPE
BUG OFF, GORDE! WE WANT YEASTHEAD!
GORDY! GORDY! GORDY! GORDY!

13 days left till add/drop ends

Grab a form, head for the course list and good luck!

By DEBORAH BRUNO
Collegian Correspondent

It's back to school for another semester and all the red tape its first weeks involve.

The first priority for students looking to add/drop form, which will be available from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. until Friday in the Music Room in the Campus Center, the main lobby of Herter Hall and outside room 120 of the school of management. These forms must be turned in by Feb. 11 in the main lobby of Whitmore Administration Building.

Feb. 11 is also the last day students can declare taking a class on a pass/fail basis. These forms are available in the College of Arts and Sciences Information and Advising Center in room E-20 Machmer Hall and in Whitmore. An instructor's signature is not needed, provided the deadline is observed.

Students dropping courses between Feb. 12 and 25 will receive a 'W' and a three-part course change form and obtain the signature of the instructor or an authorized department official. Courses dropped after Feb. 25 will be recorded as an 'F' unless a late 'W' is approved by a dean because of extenuating circumstances.

Students should be advised that faculty have the option of dropping from their courses any students who do not attend the first two class meetings. Not attending the class, however, is not an automatic way to drop a course; all drops must be submitted on an add/drop form.

Throughout the 14-day add period, CASIAC will post an open course list in Machmer Hall. It will be updated daily.

Faculty and student advisers will be on duty from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. weekdays in CASIAC to help with adds, drops, changes of major, pass/fail choices and exemptions from any academic regulations that may apply.

Those interest in registering for courses at Smith, Amherst, Mount Holyoke, or Hampshire colleges who are not first semester freshmen can do so until Feb. 8 at CASIAC's Five College Office in E-27A Machmer Hall. Classes began yesterday at Amherst and Smith while Hampshire starte tomorrow and Mount Holyoke on Friday.

TIMOTHY HUTTON CAPTURES NEW YORK CITY IN "TURK 182!"

Academy Award winner Timothy Hutton plays a very new kind of hero in "Turk 182!" As the fighting mad, hip and resourceful Jimmy Lynch, he sets out to prove you can battle City Hall to right a wrong. His older brother, a firefighter, is injured while saving a child from a burning tenement. But since he was off-duty and having a drink in the local bar, an uncaring city bureaucracy has refused him a pension.

Crusader Excites City

When the mayor is too busy running for re-election to hear his case, Jimmy Lynch takes matters into his own hands. Using only his wits, Jimmy sets out to prove that you can fight City Hall, and the entire city rallies behind the mysterious crusader known as Turk 182.

TIMOTHY HUTTON stars in "TURK 182!" as Jimmy Lynch, a young man whose crusade to redeem his brother's reputation rallies an entire city to his side.

Hutton proves riveting as Jimmy Lynch, a budding artist pushed into action to fight for his brother's life—and justice. Recently starring with Sean Penn and Lori Singer in "The Falcon and the Snowman", Hutton has followed his Oscar-winning debut in "Ordinary People" with extraordinary performances in films such as "Taps", "Daniel" and "Iceman".

Joining Hutton in this exciting urban adventure are Robert Urich, Kim Cattrall, Robert Culp, Darren McGavin and Peter Boyle.

FEBRUARY MEANS FOR MOVIEGOERS

Doug McKeon is burning up—he's getting dangerously close to college without hitting a "home run" with any girl, much less Kelly Preston, the cutest one in the class. Let's face it—it's the 1950's, and Doug would settle for a "single". That is, until big city buddy (and screen newcomer) Chris Nash arrives at school and bets that he can help Doug hit a grand slam.

A winning cast

The cast of "Mischief" is particularly hip. Doug McKeon is best known as the "suck-face" kid in "On Golden Pond". Kelly Preston, soon to be seen in the upcoming "Secret Admirer", played the luscious damsel in distress in "Metal Storm". Catherine Mary Stewart, who plays Chris Nash's girlfriend, was a smash hit as the lead in both "Night of the Comet" and "The Last Starfighter".

"Please, Marilyn—it's been 18 years!"

"MISCHIEF"

Boy & girl in search of a contact lens.

Major league mischief

Together, Doug, Kelly, Chris and Catherine stir up more rowdy "mischief" than little Nelsonville, Ohio can take in one year. We're talking major league tomfoolery here: motorcycles on sidewalks, cars on fire hydrants, parents on the warpath, romance on the sly. In short, all the things that make life worth living before college.

The cars may have changed, but the action in the back seat has not!

Finding the ultimate study location calls for exploration

By JOEL P. COFFIDIS
Collegian Staff

Sooner or later most students have to study and the search for an appropriate study spot becomes a major concern.

Fortunately, there are many places on and near campus that are conducive to studying for various study habits.

Goodell Library offers about 400 study spaces on its second and sixth floors. The study rooms are usually quiet and contain large tables and single desks.

Marjorie Naylor, a sophomore communications major, said she prefers studying at Goodell Library.

"I study in Goodell in the periodical room because you have your own private space and it's fairly quiet," Naylor said. She added, "Once I'm there I'm not as tempted to walk back to the dorm."

The Tower Library has about 500 study spaces on the 26th floor and on the perimeter of book stack floors. These places are quiet but the study spaces on the main floor are usually less quiet and more distracting because of the area's location and size. But the main floor is a good place to socialize while pretending to study. The Physical Sciences Library, another study area, located on the second floor of the Graduate Research Center, contains materials for research and reference in specific fields.

In the Campus Center there are soft chairs and couches to study or sleep on in the music reading room, the Cape Cod lounge and the first floor of the building.

The Morrill Biological Sciences Library, located on the second floor of Morrill Science Center, offeres study space for students interested in biological and geological material.

The Music Library, in room 149 of the Fine Arts Center, contains about 40 study spaces. This library offers a wide variety of music that students can listen to through headphones while studying.

Students who want a more relaxed environment can find themselves at home by studying at the Hatch or Blue Wall. Here, one can study with a beer to help them relax before that all-important calculus exam. These two spots offer a much more social atmosphere where one can speak loudly about both literary and non-academic subjects.

A comfortable afternoon study space is located in the study room in Memorial Hall where roomy couches to relax on can be found. This spot closes at sundown so don't expect to go here at night. Continued on page 11a

TERADYNE

From TERADYNE
A Very Large Scale Invitation from a Technology Leader

In electronics, the era of very large scale integration (VLSI) has arrived, leaving many companies with products suddenly obsolete and engineering staffs struggling to catch up.

But not Teradyne. Thanks to $75 million spent on R&D in 1981-1985, Teradyne was ready and waiting for VLSI.

Ready with VLSI memory testers, logic testers, analog testers, board testers.

Ready in Boston, Ma. and Woodland Hills, Calif., where Teradyne develops ATE for the electronics industry.

Ready in Deerfield, Illinois, center for Teradyne's telephone system testing operations.

Ready in Nashua, New Hampshire, where Teradyne produces backplane connection systems and state-of-the-art circuit board technology designed to meet VLSI requirements.

This kind of technology leadership spells growth. Excitement. Challenge. Career opportunities you just can't find anywhere else.

Teradyne. A company ahead of its time, looking for some good people to keep it ahead.

Fine Arts Center ready for spring

The University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center Concert Hall has released its Spring 1985 schedule of events. This exciting roster of nationally and internationally reknowned talent begins on Thursday, January 31 when pianist James Barbagallo, medalist in the 1982 Tchaikovsky International Piano Competition, takes to the stage with a program of Back, Schumann, Ravel, and Prokofiev.

February's full schedule opens with the antics of Les Ballets Trockadero de Monte Carlo, who will appear on Monday February 4. On Thursday the 7th the Minnesota Orchestra will perform at 7 p.m. Marcel Marceau makes his annual Amherst appearance on Saturday February 9. Neil Simon's autobiographical play "Brighton Beach Memoirs" will be performed at 2 p.m. and 8 p.m. on Sunday February 10. The Demon Drummers and Dancers of Sado will apear on Wednesday February 20th. The Negro Ensemble Company's production of "A Soldier's Play" will be presented on Saturday the 23rd. The month closes on Wednesday the 27th with the appearance of the ever-popular Julliard String Quartet.

March 12 the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center takes the stage. The Mabou Mimes will have a mini-residence on campus, presenting "Prelude to Death in Venice" on Tuesday March 26, and "Company" Friday and Saturday the 29th and 30th. Both plays will be held in the Rand Theater. In between, the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, featuring pianist Andre-Michel Schub, will appear in the Concert Hall on Wednesday the 27th. March closes on a musical note as the New England Bach Festival presents Handel's "Messiah" on Sunday the 31st.

April ushers in a variety of entertainment, starting with Robert Davidovici on violin on Wednesday April 3. The Pilobolus Dance Theater wil appear on Thursday the 11th. A featured attraction in the Spring 1985 program, the Texas Opera Company's production of "The Barber of Seville," will appear on Wednesday April 17. The Jazz All-Stars play Sunday the 21st, and the Portland String Quartet will perform Thursday April 25, closing the Spring season.

Tickets for all events are available at the Fine Arts Center Box office (545-2511), local DATATIX outlets, and at the Springfiled Civic Center. For phone charge reservations, call 1-800-243-4842. Master Card and Visa accepted. Except where otherwise specified, all events take place in the Concert Hall and begin at 8 p.m.

Les Ballets Trockadero de Monte Carlo, an all-male company from New York City, will appear in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall on Monday, february 4.

Lessing's return to Earth

The Diaries of Jane Somers
Doris Lessing
502 pps, $6.95, Vintage Books

By PETER WISSOKER
Collegian Staff

In the last book which Doris Lessing published under ner own name she took over one hundred and fifty pages to explain three basic concepts. The first was that if an army invades a country, the inhabitants should meet them at the landing field, invite them into their homes, and assimilate them until they get bored. The second point was that rhetoric was a disease (see Laurie Anderson's "Language is just a virus"), and the third was that basic principles of sociology which have been proved again and again should be taught in the public schools. These include the principles of group behavior. For example, Lessing feels that one would be much less frustrated if one knew at an early age that in our society people have a tendency to join groups, and that as soon as one leaves a certain group one immediately gravitates towards a new group. Our need to find acceptance in that new group makes us helpless against their ideas.

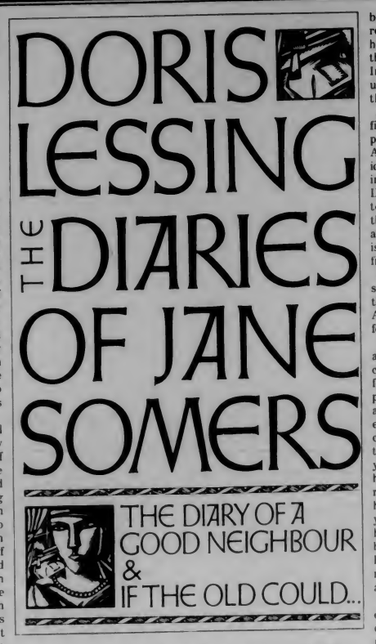
In Lessing's two latest book (which were first published under the pseudonym of Jane Somers, and are now published in this one volume, she returns from the topic of space fiction to more earthbound subjects, without the outer space metaphors. When her last few books published before these two "diaries" alienated many people, Lessing found it necessary to remove the setting of her stories from planet Earth out of a sense of frustration. There seemed to be no solution to the problems which people enbcounter on this planet; as in The Golden Notebook where all kinds of alternative solutions to being caught up in society are tried and finally rejected. In addition, many of the issues which were brought up in her books were being ignored because of the tendency to categorize her books by subject. Again The Golden Notebook is a good example. The book deals with at least seven or eight different issues but when it was published in 1962 it was read and evaluated as a treatise on the 'sex war' which meant that most people missed the point of the book.

These two novels chronicle Lessing's return to writing about what is taking place on our planet. The books are very different, although they have the same narrator, Jane or Janna Somer. The first book is about Janna, her life as a magazine editor and her relationship with a ninety year old woman that she meets in a shop and befriends.

The book, The Diary of a Good Neighbor is actually rather unnerving. It leaves the reader slightly uncomfortable when finished. The plot is similar in some respects to that of a short story Lessing wrote about twelve years ago call "An Old Woman and Her Cat." It is the story of a very poor woman who lives with her cat in a house with no heat and no electricity and ultimately no walls. She walks around London pushing a cart, bumping into people and asking them to give her their old clothes. She eats pigeons her cat catches for her. Eventually they find her by her smell. Dead for a couple of weeks. Her cat is rounded up as a stray and killed.

This time the old woman is not as poor as Hetty, the woman in the short story. Maudie, or Mrs. Fowler as she like to be called, lives in a cold basement. She refuses to see doctors or have the Home Help which the government sends around to assist her. Sher lives with her memories, her anger and her self respect and with her day to day struggle to make it; to make it to the bucket before she wets herself or to lift a cup of tea after all her energy has been used making it to the door to let the cat out.

Into Maudie's life comes Jane, or Janna. Jane feels that part of the reason she looks after Maudie is because she couldn't face her husband when he was dying of cancer and had little success with her mother's illness a few years later. "Better late than never," she repeats to her sister who nursed their mother. Janna's relatives and her associates at Lilith, the fashion/women's magazine where she works, cannot understand her kindness to and friendship with this ninety year old woman. But Janna does become Maudie's friend, doing her shopping, washing her, and perhaps most importantly talking with her. They sit for hours at night talking by the fire, sometimes in a good mood, sometimes not.



Lessing presents a challenge, relating to the old. She deals with people who are often cranky, not intentionally, but because our society and their health have rendered them powerless, no longer in control of their own lives, in no position to do what they want. In the second novel in this book Janna finds herself in a similar position.

Janna's life with Maudie is balanced by her life at Lilith. It is at the office where she always felt most at home. This is the world that kept her from her husband. Or was it her desire to succeed in that world?

The balance between Janna's two lives makes up the book. It is told in a conversational way, first as a diary and then as recordings set down periodically. In tone it differs from any of Lessing's other works. It is bare, conversational, very direct. Somers/Lessing does not show us what is going on in the narrator's mind as often as in Lessing's previous books. But she carries over the technique of describing typical days for many of the characters in the book. These caricatures are very enlightening. The deliberate tracing of someone else's schedule is something that everyone should try.

The Diary of a Good Neighbor is an excellent book and one which if it is read could have the power to change people's minds about the elderly and the poor, because it brings it all home. Somers says that she will try to write a realistic novel after she finishes her romantic novel about hospital and home helpers but we learn in the next book that she can't because it is too depressing to tell the truth. In fact when Lessing submitted this book for publication under the pseudonym of Jane Somers it was rejected for that very reason.

Lessing was surprised when people didn't recognize the first Jane Somers book as hers. So, living happily with the pseudonym, she wrote a second book, If the Old Could.... Again the reviewers did not guess the author's true identity. This says something about reviewers. Of course in hindsight it's easy to criticize, but this book should be to Doris Lessing as the song "The Old Man Down the Road" is to John Fogerty. Everybody who hears it on the radio thinks that it is an old Creedence Clearwater song when it actually came out last month. This book, If the Old Could... is a return for Doris Lessing to the style that made people first think that her books were worth reading.

If the Old Could... deals with four or five major plots. In some ways it is a much more "regular" novel, written in the first person, than is The Diary of a Good Neighbor. Again Janna has an old woman to look after, but she is not fond of Annie as she was of Maudie.

The personal politics in this book are great. Janna is almost the earthly embodiment of the solutions that characters in other Lessing book have been searching for for years. But she can't do it alone. She relies on different people. Her lover Richard, her niece Jill, another woman at the office, Hannah. These people live and breathe, express things without words, exchange glances, are contradictory in their behavior towards each other and towards themselves. Jill is perceived by Janna as a younger version of herself. Yet when watching Jill with her boyfriend Mark (to whom she gives only the socially required/accepted attention) Janna says over and over to herself "don't make the same mistake I did, care about your lover." Janna dreams every night of her dead husband as she goes over in her sleep what might have been if she felt the electricity she feels when she is with Richard. "I didn't marry the wrong man," she said, "he married the wrong woman." Hence the title. It comes from a French proverb, "If the young knew, if the old could."

The book questions its own politics with some of its characterizations. For example Hannah, a lesbian, is described as Aztec and as Earth Mother. This is not necessarily meant in a complementary way yet Lessing seems to like the character.

The reason the book works so well is that the narrator has an uncanny ability to do two things at once. She both sees and feels. She is beyond politics. She is a normal person yet she is not. she is a woman who is as much alive as you and me, and not like a character in a novel. Everything she does is backed up in this logical and extremely complete portrayal.

Somers is also obsessed with clothes although less so since she began to realize that what she paid for clothes would feed a family of four for quite a while. She is tolerant of punks as long as they are committed to making it a style and not just something they throw together. It takes getting up a few hours early, she notes, for a punk to get their hair and clothes just right.

The book ends where it started with Janna all alone in her apartment. Yet unlike the book early in the "The Children of Violence" series where the same thing happens and you feel like "why did I waste my time reading this, nothing really happened," one gets the sense that a lot of water has passed under the bridge and that both diarist and reader will not be the same for it.

In these two very different novels contained in this one volume, Lessing faces up to the unsolvable contradictions that forced her away from the realistic fiction fifteen years ago. She attempts to record these contradictions and what follows them because of their existence. What separates Lessing from the average romance author is that the characters (most of them) are very aware and rather poignant. Rather than enriching our dreams, they, in their observations and lifestyles, serve to reinforce the ability of every person to live a more aware and more alive existence on our planet, the one we are stuck on, earth.

Genesis to nemesis

German Expressionism
Smith College Museum of Art

By MICHAEL PHILLIPS
Collegian Correspondent

The twenty-one prints in this exhibition reveal the many phases of German Expressionism. The artists in the show were first and foremost painters, yet the aggression of their paintings was easily manifested through the immediacy of the printing techiques used. The scratching of a copper plate and gauging out of an image from a block of wood; not only were these techniques a longstanding tradition, they also represented the artist's heightened response to his materials and his environment. They had all dabbled with Cubism and Impressionsism, but neither held the answer. It was only when color and form were liberated by a group nicknamed Les Fauves (the Wild Beasts) that painting became the voice of the angst of that age. Great gashes of color, gouts of paint, screaming images were flung onto the canvas.

Many of their images depicted men and women who were observed through a lens which revealed them as base creatures, thinly disguised by awkward social trappings as civilized beings. They join archaic religious symbols, primitive naked beings, with edible things and things eating. Others, as with a lot of these in this show, reveal figures in a closer harmony with nature. Compare Campendocks 'Male Nude with Fish,' with its delicately painted flow of color, to Max Beckmann's 'The Large Operation' with its macabre scratchy aggression. There are images of life and death, from 'Genesis' and the creation to the Nemisis of death. Within these prints both subjects are committed with a hesitant scratch in dry point or a ripped-out streak in the woodcuts.

Max Beckmann's social criticism, similar to the satiric images of Georg Grosz, entangles the observer in a web of voyeurism. We look on into the tram as someone stares out at us; a little bearded man peeps out at everything, and all the while we travel the street with its scenes of impoverished activity. These images are historical document. They reveal the social turbulance, the void, left by the dissolution of the status quo as a result of the First World War. They depict the state of mind of a people in physical and mental agony, people without stable values, no religion, no politics and a hollow social structure driven from one horror to another. In Beckmann's words "All around was chaos and confusion."

These artists were "too young" for the First World War and "too old" for the second. They witnessed the atrocities of both wars and the steady path of social decay and moral corruption that lead to them. Like many German and European artists of that time they fled Hitler's tyranny against 'degenerate' art (entartete kanst). Expressionism is still around, raising its ugly mirrored head to society. Can we still respond to these images, in a society in which the horrors depicted are called 'entertainment?' Have we become desensitized? When we switch on the T.V. we see no little bearded man peering out at us, no conscience. We just sit ther and lap it up while it absorbs us. Are we numbed to the images, and more important have we become de-sensitized to the suffering and horrors depicted in these images?

If we can just dismiss these images as 'Art', if we can't feel that angst, we lay ourselves open to manipulation. We pave the way to more horror. I sometimes wonder if we can still feel these things, let alone express them.

A performance in the art of belief and the strategies of man-powered flight

By MICHAEL PHILLIPS
Collegian Correspondent

It's the thought that counts. Or maybe the lack of it. the bumble bee for instance, aerodynamically speaking, cannot fly. Its body mass and wing surface are not compatible. Ignorant of this, the bee flies around happy in its innocence. The human being is also, aerodynamically speaking, unsuited for flight, having no wings and an even greater body mass. We are, however, aware of the facts. It therefore takes an awful lot of belief to defy the laws of nature and fly or walk-on water. Belief is a sign of limited intelligence in that it is far easier to believe and accept than to think and ask questions. Is the belief needed for such a flight comparable and even equal to the ignorance of the bumble bee?

Flight has always been seen as an achievement of some higher spiritual level. The Artist and Art have always been synonymous with this achievement or at least the struggle for it. Flight is possible. The picture proves that "the camera never lies." That it is printed in a newspaper substantiates the "fact that newspapers never lie." Is it possible for the Artist to fly by a blissfull ignorance, an unquestioning belief, or an overwhelming aesthetic?

The image on the photograph is of me stepping of the Library Tower at the start of my flight. It was constructed by laying a transparency over the image of the Tower. This is obvious. In order to hold a belief we have to accept the evidence that supports it. The picture is the evidence. Faith on the other hand feeds on doubt. It is doubtful that I ever flew off the Tower. This doubt is increased by revealing the construction of the photograph. Somewhere between the belief and the faith lies the ability to fly.

The whole thing is very ambiguous. In an age where we are more than ever aware of our physical nature and the physical nature of the universe, we are witnessing the rejection of this knowledge. Religious fundamentalism, superstition and even nationalism are evidence of this rejection, and they are as much a part of our culture as science. The Artist responds to this milieu. My response is this performance. Truth, belief, faith and knowledge all fly from the top of the building with me.

Is it responsible to depict an apparent suicide? We are all responsible for the future, the Artist as much if not more than anyone else. Creativity is being crushed. The Artist, by cringing behind frames and on top of plinths, is accepting a role and a function designed by others primarily for monetary reasons. That is, the Art market. Creativity is being forced to comform to the back and call of a belief in money, and this belief is suffocating it. If Art is to fly it will do so under an ever changing progressive aesthetic and not such a belief.

The Library Tower represents the accumulated knowledge of our culture. The Tower is crumbling, yet it stands erect, penetrating the heavens. Something sexual? Has it the potency to fertilize the future? When leaping off today into tomorrow it is easier to fall than fly. The responsibility for suicide rests with us all.

WARNING: Jumping from high buildings can seriously damage your health.

Savage Gallery rededication plans

This February, the Augusta Savage Memorial Gallery, located in the New Africa House, will open its doors to celebrate 1985's Black History Month. The works of artists Alan Rohan Crite, Tom Feelings, Paul Goodnight, Murcie Poplar Lavender and Augusta Savage will be exhibited.

The month-long celebration will include an artist's reception on Friday February 8 from 4-8 p.m., featuring a slide presentation by Goodnight on Nicaragua, Haiti and their effect upon the growth his works, which will be shown at 5:30. Following this presentation will be a poetry reading and a dance performance, by Ingrid C. Askew and Patty D. O'Neal respectively.

On Sunday February 10 Murcie Poplar Lavender will rededicate the Gallery to Augusta Savage. Beginning at 3 p.m. with a dance performance by Patty D. O'Neal, the festivities will run until 8 p.m.

Throughout the month the Gallery will be showing historical and educational films. Contact the Gallery at 545-0932 for programming schedules. All are welcomed to join in the events offered, which are sponsored by the Department of Afro-American Studies, the Chancellor's Office, the Five College Black Studies Executive Committee, the Residential Education-East Office, and the UMass Arts Council.

Welcome back, Arts writers!!! Stop by the Arts desk for information about stories, a staff meeting, and plans for our party!

Everywoman's Center has 'community reach'

By DEBORAH ROSS

The Everywoman's Center (EWC) at the University of Massachusetts, which was originally established to serve the needs of women in the five college community, has reached the stage where it is consulted by women from all over the country, according to Aquila Ayana, public relations and outreach coordinator at the center.

The center, which was founded in 1972 from the collective efforts of several valley women's groups, has since grown into a multi-service organization providing a variety of services and programs with "broad community reach," Ayana said.

The EWC serves 16,000 women annually in call-ins and walk-ins alone, she said. She added that these contacts can take the form of anything from women across the country interested in establishing their own women's center, to local community women seeking information about doctors in the area, to UMass students requiring help with research projects.

In addition to answering questions, the EWC also offers women "a safe place to be," Ayana said, for there is a lounge (pleasantly overheated) where women can sit, talk and study, or perhaps read books borrowed from the EWC library, which stocks fiction and non-fiction ranging from Helen Van Syke to Betty Friedan.

Beyond establishing a safe atmosphere, the EWC is especially committed to meeting the needs of low-income women, working women, single parents, older women, lesbians, and Third World women and addressing such issues as violence against women. Programs have been designed with these populations and issues in mind.

There is a counselling program that offers individual and group therapy on such issues as sexual identity and eating disorders which is described by Linda Sckalor, a senior UMass student who has participated in both individual therapy and a support group at the EWC, as "very helpful."

Further, counsellor advocates are available through a 24-hour on-call system to assist people who have been raped, sexually assaulted or battered. Pat Barrows, coordinator of the Counsellor Advocates Program, described it as "the largest crisis center in Western Massachusetts." She suggested that without this resource "incidents of sexual abuse would "definitely be reported less."

The Everywoman's Center, located in Wilder Hall, is open from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday, Tuesday, and Friday and from 12 p.m. to 7 p.m. Wednesday. Telephone 545-0883, or in an emergency, for the victims of violence, call 545-0800.

To complement the range of services designed to support women who have experienced violence, there is the Educator/Advocates Against Violence Against Women Program which concentrates more on prevention than intervention.

"We spend a lot of time at this University addressing the issue of violence against women, which is essential," said Kathy Alexander, coordinator of this program which provides workshops and presentations on such issues as child-abuse, battering and rape.

"It's very important that men and women are educated on these topics," said Alexander, citing the fact the 60 to 65 percent of women who are raped know the assailant. The EWC "can help women understand that it is rape and that they should not be afraid to come forward," she said.

The Working Women's Program at the center provides educational and supportive services around the issue of women and employment. Information on such topics as affirmative action, sexual harassment and occupational health are made available through this program, as well as workshops and support groups dealing with topics pertinent to working women. These include assertiveness training and the development of leadership skills.

In addition, the EWC offers a Third World Women's Program, to meet the requirements of Third World women in the community; a Women's Admission and General Educational Support (WAGES) service to help low income single parents return to school; and a public relations and outreach service to make available information on speakers, artists and musicians with women-identified messages.

As well as providing a gamut of services and programs geared towards women, the EWC also plays a key role in the formation of University policy and has "inputs into all facets of the University," Ayana said.

Each staff member at the center sits on at least one University committee to "raise issues that will affect women at a University level," she said.

Sckalor said she believes that the existence of the EWC is "very important," not just as a feature of the UMass Campus but because "in society it is important that women have a place to go."

Mount Holyoke College plays giant trivia game

By TOM MIDDLETON
Collegian Staff

To relieve the monotony of the winter break, Mount Holyoke College students and faculty took part in building and playing a giant-sized version of Trivial Pursuit last Tuesday night.

The tennis court sized game board, the largest in the world according to the school's Student Activities Office, was designed by the theater arts department and modeled after the original. A trivia category about the college was added, said Kris Renn, one of the organizers of the event.

The two teams of 36 players working in four one-hour shifts were cheered on by about 200 students and faculty from the balconies.

The winners were given a choice of prizes between a cake resembling the board game or a $2 gift certificate from Herrel's Ice Cream.

Instead of rolling the regular sized die, students made a 5-square-foot cube of foam rubber. Students dressed in different colored outfits were subsituted for the wedges used in the regular sized game. When a correct answer was given the colorfully dressed "wedges" climbed into giant-sized game pieces.

Eight judges presided over the game while four masters of ceremonies gave the play-by-play. Forty-one students helped build the 36 square-foot board game.

Spectators whispered from the balcony answers to such questions as; where is the headquarters of Kellog Cereals? (Battle Creek, Michigan) and who discovered Jamaica? (Christopher Columbus).

Some of the questions from the Mount Holyoke trivia category were: "What time does the last bus run from Amherst to Mount Holyoke College on weeknights?" and, "What are the names of the college president's four dogs?"

Other winter events at the college were breakdancing, an obstacle course and a performance by Roger McGuinn, former leader of the 60's band The Byrds.

★ study space

The Newman Center is a popular place to study because it offers two study lounges and a library as well as a cafeteria in the basement with about 300 seats where students socialize while they study.

UMass students who don't mind traveling can take advantage of the Amherst Public libraries or any of the five-college libraries. Amherst College is home to the Robert Frost library which is a very quiet place to study.

One of the best kept secrets about the Amherst College library is the 200 some odd American and foreign films on video cassette available to any five college area student. With a college I.D., students can sample a wide variety of flics ranging from Alfred Hitchcock thrillers to Japanese samurai films free of charge.

If none of the mentioned areas suit your need, dependable dormitory lounges or your own residential abode can serve as study spaces. The right place to study usually is the result of experimentation and experience.

UMass basketball notebook

Neysmith and Russell rewriting Minuteman record book

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

At the same point in the season last year, after 15 games, the University of Massachusetts basketball team was 5-10 and 1-6 in the conference.

After 15 games this season UM is 7-8 and 3-3 in the league, thanks mainly to the work of senior captains Horace Neysmith and Donald Russell.

In statistics up to the Dartmouth game last Tuesday, Russell was third on the all-time UM scoring list with 1,383 points, a career average of 14.3. He trailed Edwin Green by only ten and Julius Erving by 120 points.

Russell needs to average 10 points over the remaining 12 games to go into first, and if he keeps up his current 17 point average, he will break the record at St. Joseph's on February 14.

Neysmith, eighth all-time, needs to average 22.75 to pass Dr. J., but can, if he continues on his 14.6 points-per-game pace, entrench himself solidly in second place.

Both captains will take the UMass lead in games and minutes played this season, depending on how far UM goes in the Atlantic 10 tournament.

Russell held the record for foul shot attempts coming into the season with 449, he now has 532, but fell behind

Neysmith is fourth on the career rebounding list with 809 boards, 240 behind the Doc and 94 behind Tim Edward (1964-67). He is averaging 8.6 rebounds a game now and will end the season with 912, easily in second place.

Neysmith as the big man went to the line 109 times up to the Dartmouth game. Horace has 568 attempts.

UMass sports information director Howard David will have a lot of rewriting to do in the record book by the time the captains graduate.

Canadian forward/center Tom Swick left UMass for Niagara before the Vanderbilt Tournament just after Christmas. The 6-8, 220 pounder played just eight minutes in two games for UMass, scoring two points. According to coach Ron Gerlufsen, Swick was homesick and missed his girlfriend. Niagara is just 25 miles from his hometown, Notre Dame, Ontario.

Point guard Carl Smith has started all 44 of the games UM has played since his freshman year. The 5-10 Atlantic 10 and UMass season assist leader has 283 assists through a year and a half and should easily move into first place when he's done. He has also averaged over 35 minutes a game in his Minuteman career.

Power forward Bobby Braun has been having the best season of his UMass career. The 6-6 senior is averaging 8.1 points and 7.8 rebounds a game this year. His previous highs were 4.9 and 4.7 respectively. He is also playing over 30 minutes a game, ten minutes over his career average.

Neysmith was the first UM player since Alex Eldrige to be named Atlantic 10 player-of-the-week. Horace got the award last week for averaging 23.5 points and 8.5 rebounds in victories over St. Joseph's (89-80) and St. Bonaventure (69-53). For the week he was 17-of-27 from the floor (63 percent).

UMass basketball coach Ron Gerlufsen has led the Minutemen to a 3-3 record in the Atlantic 10 Conference this season.

Lorenzo Sutton was rookie-of-the-week for the week starting January 5 with 22 points in his first start against Rutgers. He should join Neysmith, Russell and Smith as a member of the all-rookie team.

Holy Cross guard Dog McCrory, who left the Cross after racial charges were leveled at coach George Blaney, contacted Gerlufsen about transfering to UMass, but the 6-5 swingman would have to compete with Matt Ryan (6-4), Darry Carter (6-5) and Sutton (6-2) for time. He wasn't "encouraged" according to Gerlufsen and instead chose Hartford.

BASKETBALL

Minutemen stay in Atlantic 10 race with hot January

Win three straight on good defense, improving offense, starters excell

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

The loss of center Edwin Green to graduation was tragic enough. High-scoring sophomore forward John Hempel then decided to transfer to St. John's University. The 1984-85 University of Massachusetts basketball team, according to coach's polls and nearly everyone else, wasn't supposed to be able to compete.

But, 15 games into the season they are 7-8 overall and 3-3 in the Atlantic 10. The Minutemen have won three straight. They've taken a few beatings, but dished out a few also.

"This team has been through a lot," coach Ron Gerlufsen said. "We lost some key players, then had to shuffle out lineup around looking for a good combination. A few teams took it to us, but I think we've turned the corner."

At the semester break, UMass was 2-3 and sputtering along with three consecutive losses to UConn, Hartford and Boston University (3 OT). The rest of the season up until now went like this:

UMass 67, Northeastern 66

Carl Smith to the rescue, again. UM's 5-10 point guard, like he's done so often in the past, won the game with a one-handed jumper from the lane with four seconds left on the clock for a major upset of the second-ranked team in New England.

UMass trailed by as much as 11, 52-41, in the second half, but ran off ten unanswered points to tie the game at 58.

NU took a 66-63 lead before guard Donald Russell hit two free throws and then stole the ball from NU's Reggie Lewis with 1:07 to go. UMass called timeout with 27 seconds to go and called for a clear-out for Smith.

Smith drove the lane and hit the game-winner. UMass snapped a three game losing streak with the exciting win. Russell had 17 points, Horace Neysmith has 13 and Smith added 14.

Clemson 86, UMass 72

In the first round of the Music City Classic at Vanderbilt University, the Minutemen fell behind 13-3 early and couldn't catch up. Bobby Braun and Russell had 20 points each.

Senior co-captain Donald Russell drives for a hoop against Duquesne. The 6-1 guard is one of the Atlantic 10's leading scorers.

Columbia 52, UMass 40

Neysmith and Russell sat out the game for disciplinary reasons, and Columbia took the advantage. Braun had a season-high 20 points and 11 rebounds. Ron Young had nine.

Duquesne 59, UMass 53

The Dukes had five players in double figures as UMass was outscored 31-22 in the second half. Russell had 14 with Neysmith and Braun getting 12 each. Duquesne's high-scoring Rick Suder was held to just six.

UMass 83, Rutgers 72

Freshman guard Lorenzo Sutton, starting for the first time in an attempt by Gerlufsen to create some offense, scored 22 points (he was later named A-10 rookie of the week) as UM snapped a 15 game losing streak against the Scarlet Knights.

Neysmith had 20 and Russell 19 as the Minutemen, now 4-6, led 41-36 at halftime and broke it open early in the second half as Sutton scored six quick points. He had 18 second half points.

Temple 65, UMass 39

The Minutemen travelled to Philadelphia and were victimized by nine straight minutes of being unable to score and a good Temple ballclub, led by Granger Hall (19 points).

Temple led 34-21 at the half and ran off to quick 50-30 lead with 9:46 to go in the game. Dutton stayed hot with 17 points.

West Virginia 82, UMass 59

The Minutemen fell to 4-8 as sloppy ballhandling and J.J. Crawl's 18 points spelled defeat in Morgantown.

Sutton had 14 points as UMass, averaging 11 turnovers coming into the game, committed 14 in the first half and 25 in the game.

Neysmith had 11 as did Russell. Jackie Sheehan returned to action for the first time since last year after an injured back.

UMass 89, St. Joseph's 80

The streak began with this game as Russell poured in 26 points including two three-pointers. Neysmith had 24 as UM's big guns were booming loudly at the Springfield Civic Center.

UMass took a slim 37-35 lead at halftime and had a 17-8 run as Neysmith scored six points. St. Joe's got to within six with 44 seconds left, but UMass scored six unanswered points for the win. UMass was a fine 27-of-40 from the field.

"It was a big win for us, we showed how we could play and kept it up from there," Gerlufsen said.

UMass 69, St. Bonaventure 53

Neysmith had 23 points and Russell 16 as UMass went to 6-8 with a win over the 8-5 Bonnies, who lost to number two St. John's by only one point earlier in the season.

UMass took a commanding 28-14 halftime lead, forcing the Bonnies into 1-of-12 shooting and six turnovers in the opening seven minutes as Neysmith scored ten of the first 12 UM points, one on a nice lob pass from Smith.

The Minutemen did nothing wrong on this game. They showed solid defense and a controlled offense that scored when needed, spelling doom for the visitors. Smith had six assists in the game and ten points. UM forced 18 Bonnie turnovers.

UMass 84, Dartmouth 78

UMass played another good defensive first half (a 34-22 lead) into its third straight victory.

Neysmith had 24 (UMass is 5-0 when he scores 20 or more) and Russell 21 as UM climbed to 7-8. Sutton had 15 (he is six with eight assists. Wilbert Hicks, a freshman forward, had six in 12 good minutes.

Minuteman point guard Carl Smith drives the lane against St. Bonaventure last week. The 5-10 sophomore has regained his scoring touch after breaking his hand.

"I think we've played well lately, it's been the defense that's done it for us," Smith said.

"We got the early lead and didn't let up (against st. Bonnie and Dartmouth), that's a big key," the sophomore lead guard said.

"This team is improving a lot, Horace has his game back and Donald is playing real well," Sheehan noted. "I think we can keep it up."

The Minutemen have won three straight for a number of reasons.

Defense: UMass has played great first half defense, coming out strong and taking a big lead has been, a big key to victory. They are causing turnovers and denying the ball to high-scoreres.

Neysmith and Russell: The dynamic duo have scored well in each win. Russell is a dangerous outside shooter and few in the league take it up stronger than Neysmith.

Smith: After breaking his hand at UConn on December 6, Smith was unable to contribute much to the offense but still played a lot of minutes. He has scored 12, 10 and six since losing his cast.

Braun: He is doing what's expected, rebounding and scoring around ten points. A tough inside player that guards the lane well on defense, he is a major factor the rest of the way.

Sutton: Gerlufsen knew he could score, but he was originally put behind Russell as an off-guard. When Darryl Carter and Young failed to produce, he went in as a small forward and proved explosive.

The bench: Sheehan, Matt Ryan, the improving Tom Emerson, George Ramming and Wilbert Hicks have all seen quality minutes off the pine. They are needed for a stretch run to the A-10 tournev.

Editors Note: This report does not include the games at George Washington (on Thursday) and at Rhode Island (on Saturday) due to deadline constraints on this first issue. Those reports will be in Wednesday's Collegian.

In the latest Atlantic 10 individual standings, Russell was sixth in overall scoring at 16.62, Neysmith was 13th at 13.92. In the league, Russell was ninth at 15.33, Neysmith was eighth at 16 and Sutton 14th at 12.33. Rebounding standings see Neysmith first in the conference with 9.50 and Braun second at 8.5. Overall Neysmith is second and Braun fourth.

Smith again leads in assists with 63 and Russell is fourth in steals with 25.

Revenge is sweet department: Last season's rookie-of-the-year in the A-10, St. Bonaventure's Alvin Lott, scored no points against Smith, who was guarding Lott and was passed up last season despite his superior play, scored 10 points, dished out six assists and had three steals. Lott fouled Smith three times and sat on the bench, unable to cope with the UMass lead guard.

Recruit David Brown, a 6-5 swingman from fabled Dunbar High in Baltimore, one of the nation's top high school teams, has been accepted into school. Gerlufsen reported that the team is after "15-20" other prospects. Assistant coaches Dennis Jackson, Neil Rosa and Mark Shea have been putting in the mileage looking to help the program. They are optomistic on their potential success, most of the players being looked at are forwards and centers, with Smith, Sutton, Jackie Sheehan and Ryan all returning, the backcourt is set. A big (7-0 plus) is what's needed to bring UMass up to national caliber on a game-by-game basis.

Speaking of Sheehan, the 6-3 pointguard has returned from a back injury and has been logging quality minutes for UM. His ball-handling ability will be needed to give Smith a rest, or if the Minutemen want to slow the tempo down.

UM vs. Penn State

This may be the best week of the semester to see the University of Massachusetts basketball team in action.

Face Facts: you have no schoolwork, you have plenty of money, and lots of time.

On Thursday, the Minutemen take on Penn State at the Springfield Civic Center. The Nittany Lions are perennial doormats in the Atlantic 10 and should provide a nice offensive exhibition by Horace Neysmith and Co. Game time is at 7:30.

On Saturday, Rhode Island invades the Springfield Civic Center for a 2 p.m. league game.

The bus ride (from Boyden) and the ticket (availible at the Boyden Ticket office and in Springfield) is also free. Call the ticket office at 545-0810 for times of bus departures.

UM women hope for improvement

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

It was a January roller-coaster ride for the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team.

The up-and-down trip actually started in late December when the women split two games at the Syracuse Tournament, beating Ohio University 60-44 before losing to the Orangewomen 61-46 in the championship final.

The women then went on a tear, defeating Vermont 74-52, Lehigh 61-59 at Amherst College and area rival Springfield College, 71-57.

The three victories evened their record at 6-6 as the team prepared for another New England rival, Yale University-a team they defeated 73-56 last season.

The women suffered through a tough shooting night, going 17-of-53 from the floor and getting only two players, Barbara Hebel (16) and Juanita Matthews (10) in double figures. The Elis came away with the victory, 60-58.

"The Yale game was a tough one for us to lose," UMass coach Barbara Stevens said last week. "It was a team we needed to beat to go into a tough schedule of conference games on a positive note."

The notes were nothing but sour for the next four games, all Atlantic 10 contests against nationally-ranked teams.

Rutgers University invaded Amherst and beat the Minutewomen 80-48. The team then embarked on a three game swing down the East Coast, two games in Philadelphia against Temple and St. Joseph's and a game at Penn State against the top five Nitanny Lions.

Temple was a 78-64 winner at the UMass women stayed in the game but couldn't get a run together. St. Joe's then dominated UMass, winning 75-48.

The final game of the journey was the worst: Penn State administered a savage 90-37 beating last Monday.

"They were all tough games and hard on what had been the strong point of our team, the defense," Stevens said.

"They were all good teams in the fact that they were nationally ranked. Our conference is the fourth best in the nation and it's tough every game to go out and play a team like Penn State close."

Stevens said that she was happy with the play of 6-2 sophomore center Karen Fitzgerald.

"Karen was asked at the beginning of the season to step into the middle and she's done a good job. We're a small team and she has a big responsibility under the boards," Stevens said. "Against teams like St. Joseph's and Penn State, she's giving away a lot of height, but she held her own in there."

The statistics bear this out. Fitzgerald is the second highest scorer for the Minutewomen with a 9.9 average after 17 games.

6-1 freshman forward Susan Burtoft has been another consistent for Stevens and UMass. She's been getting a team-high 6.5 rebounds a game and scoring six points a contest.

But the main scoring threat is still junior guard Barbara Hebel.

The 5-9 Hebel is averaging 11.1 points-per-game and leading the team from the foul line with an 80 percent average (42-of-52).

"She has had her trouble from the floor at 35 percent, but leads the team in minutes played at 26.4 a game.

Eleven women average over ten minutes a game for UMass this season, a course of action Stevens hopes will help in the future.

"We're getting a lot of players time off the

Sports Staff meeting

There will be a meeting of the Collegian sports staff on Wednesday, January 30 at 5 p.m. in the newsroom.

All beat writers must attend this meeting so we can plan for the end of the season coverage. Also, anyone interested in writing for the sports section should attend a meeting at 5:30 p.m., also in the newsroom (first floor of the Campus Center, room 113)

NFL picks update: Scott Hood won by a slim two games, Peter Abraham and Tony Betros tied for second, Gerry deSimas, alas, was a distant fourth.

UMass forward Karen Damminger puts up a shot in January action. The Minutewomen face Harvard at Amherst College today.

Lee wins MIT open

University of Massachusetts sophomore Chris Lee won the 126-pound division in the MIT Christmas Open in the wrestling team's only Intersession competition.

Lee, who is ranked tenth nationally by the NCAA News and Wrestling USA, defeated Darry Arroyo, a two time college division All-American from Springfield College.

The men's gymnastics team, riding the crest of a 3-0 pre-holidays record, faced the Naval Academy in Annapolis on Friday before taking on the Big Green at Dartmouth on Tuesday.

Horace Neysmith throws down a reverse dunk in action over January, the Minutemen are 5- 0 when he gets 20 or more points.

Personnel changes the key for UM

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

The personality of the University of Massachusetts basketball team has changed since most students saw the Minutemen take the floor last semester.

The original two guard-three forward offense has been scrapped for a two forward-three guard offense, what coach Ron Gerlufsen labeled his "small and quick" lineup.

Horace Neysmith was moved from a small forward position to power forward next to Bobby Braun.

Lorenzo Sutton, a freshman, was moved into the small forward spot that was occupied by Ron Young and Darryl Carter when the season opened. Point guard Carl Smith and shooting guard Donald Russell remain intact in the backcourt.

The UMass offense is mainly a three guard setup with Neysmith the option under the hoop. Braun gets most of his points from offensive rebounding.

Russell and Sutton are the main outside threats with Smith, now that his broken hand has healed, also a threat from the outside and the best penetrator on the team.

Off the bench, freshman guard Matt Ryan has made his mistakes, as expected, but makes up for it with a lot of desire. Big men Tom Emerson and George Ramming have improved and given Gerlufsen quality minutes. Wilbert Hicks, another freshman, has impressed. Carter and Young may again contribute.

Walk-ons Bill Hampton and John King saw their first action against St. Bonaventure and in a minute of time Hampton stole the ball and sent King a pass that the former Western Mass player-of-the-year laid in for his first college points.

But its been Sutton, a 6-2, 185 pound guard from Albany, Georgia, that's made UMass a good team.

The Minutemen were 3-6 before he started and are 4-2 with him. The new guard went to the same prep school as Smith and Emerson, Fork Union Military Academy, and high jumped 6-10 in high school.

"Lorenzo is a shooting threat, an aspect I didn't think we had enough of before I started him," Gerlufsen said about his latest star.

"With Smitty (Carl) healing from his hand and Neysmith back where he belongs under the boards, along with Russell and Braun doing what's expected, I think we have a good nucleus for the rest of the season."

"Our defense is playing very well, we're pretty quick on the floor and both Neysmith and Braun have rebounded well. That's another big key. The bench has contributed too and we're winning consistently at home," the second year coach said. Five of the seven wins are at Springfield and UMass is 5-2 in the Civic Center. "I think we'll continue to surprise people," Gerlufsen said.

Stull hits the road looking for recruits, Reid gone?

University of Massachusetts football coach Bob Stull isn't going to sit for any more 3-8 seasons.

Stull and his staff have spent the better part of the winter in a nationwide recruiting effort to bolster the Minutemen.

Stull couldn't release any names until the scholar-athletes are actually accepted into school and have signed a letter-of-intent to play football, but did say that the team will be better at all positions.

"I'm very pleased with who we have so far," he said. "We're ahead of schedule and are doing much better than I expected. It's going to be a fine class."

Stull will release the names of several junior-college transfers this coming week. The former Orange Bowl winning Washington assistant coach has connections in California and the West Coast and is expected to draw several players from western schools.

One early signee was Alabama transfer Tim Hecht, a 6-2 quarterback who was redshirted by the Crimson Tide his freshman year before attending UM this past semester. Hecht was recruited by Alabama, Southern Methodist and Oklahoma out of high school.

"We're getting the basis now of what will be a better team in the future," Stull said. "We're working hard now to improve ourselves for the Fall."

Defense coordinator Jim Reid may be up for the University of Maine—Orono head coaching position that opened up when Ron Rogerson took on the head job at Princeton.

Reid, a 12 year veteran with the UM program, is rumored to be among the final three candidates. He graduated from Maine in 1973 after three years on the Bears' football team.

Placekicker George Papoutsidis was selected as an Associated Press Division 1-AA honorable mention All-American. The 6-1, 200 pounder from Southbridge, MA booted 16-of-17 points-after and connected on eight-of-15 field goals for 40 points. He scored 45 points his junior year after transfering from Nassau Community College. Several NFL and USFL teams scouted him during the season.

Papoutsidis, punter Jim Tandler, quarterback Jim Simeone, receiver Bob Simeone, linebacker Dave Cavanaugh, and offensive lineman Don Day were named to various AP and UPI All-New England squads. Among those not selected but deserving were running back George Barnwell, defensive back Glenn Holden, nose guard Peter Tracy and linebacker Vito Perrone. Barnwell, Tracy and Perrone were all slowed by injury during the season.

Northeastern University, previously denied membership in the Yankee Conference, may now gain enterance to the league. BU president John Silber was the main opponent of the move, but may soften his hard line against the Huskies.

UMass notebook

Gladchuck to Syracuse

Chester Gladchuck, assistant athletic director at the University of Massachusetts, left for Syracuse University to assume a similar position on January 18.

Gladchuck, who ran the general physical education program for the athletic department, was with UMass for five years. A 1973 graduate of Boston College, he held the same position as his father did at UMass.

A nationwide search is being held to find a replacement. Promotion from within is not expected.

Boyden Gym is going to be seriously overworked in the coming weeks, at the expense of student court time.

There will be virtually no open court time at Boyden to allow the men's and women's basketball, baseball and lacrosse teams time to practice.

UMass track tunes-up

Sprinters shine in January

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

Both the men's and women's track teams hope to build on solid January efforts as the big meets of the season, the New Englands and Easterns, approach.

The men, with solid performances by sprinter Rayle Crichlow, did well in the Boston University relays on January 12.

Crichlow set a school record and took third place in the 300 with a 35.1. He had a 6.5 in the dash.

Freshman Steve Tolley set a class record in the 1,000 with a 2:29.2. Ferdie Adaboe was fourth in the long jump with a leap of 21-1. Neil Dickson had a 52.1 in the 400, Ted White turned in a 1:56.5 in the 800, and Paul Stanislawzyk did a 4:18.6 mile time.

In the Dartmouth relays, Todd Johnson was fourth in the pentathalon with 3,447 points.

The Yale Invitational saw the men get another good showing by Johnson, he was second with 3,449 points. He was fifth last season in the same meet.

Other results at Yale were Crichlow with a best of 6.65 in the dash, Wayne Levy had a 14:56.0 5,000 and the 4 x 800 relay team of White, Schrebler, McIntosh and Themea went 7:45.0, good enough for fourth. St. John's won the race with a 7:42.0.

The women also had a good month, in the BU relays several women qualified for the Easterns and New Englands, led by sprinters Kayla Morrison and Bridgette Booker who turned in school records of 7.0 in the dash, both qualifying for the big meets.

Booker had a 26.0 in the 200, Barbara Cullinan qualified for both meets with a 57.5 400, Leah Loftis had a 1:17.0 500, Maureen O'Reilly had a 3:05 1,000, Chris Pratt had a 10:55.3 300 and Cari Fleischmann had a 17-1 long jump.

The 4 x 400 relay team of Sue Goldstein, Barbara Cullinan, Kayla Morrison and Leah Loftis set a school record with a 3:55.9.

Sprinter Rayle Crichlow set a school record in the 300 yard dash.

At the Dartmouth relays, Morrison had a 7.3 55 yard dash. She also did 26.4 in the 200. Cullinan went 59.36 for a fourth in the 400, and was third in the 500 with a 1:16.66. The 4 x 200 team of Fleischmann, Loftis, Morrison and Booker ran a 1:45.04. The 4 x 400 relay squad of Goldstein, Cullinan, Loftis and Morrison had a 3:55.9.

"We're progressing well," coach Kalekeni Banda said. "I think we can do well in the New Englands (they were eighth indoors and fifth outdoors last year) and in the Easterns. We compete against many teams with scholarships, so looking at it that way, we do pretty well for ourselves."

The men were in action Sunday at the Greater Boston Track Club meet at Harvard, as were the woman.

Women's soccer notebook

Banda lands top recruit from state; Stukes, Bowsher All-Americans

Kalekeni Banda, coach of the women's soccer team at the University of Massachusetts, has received a verbal committment from a top high school prospect and is battling national champion North Carolina for several more.

The Minutewomen, who finished third last season after their second straight trip to the final four, were "rebuilding" last season according to Banda with six freshmen who played a lot of minutes.

Michelle Powers, a forward from Winchester High in Massachusetts, will attend UM next season. An all-scholastic selection by the Boston Globe for two seasons, a regional and national select camp participant and All-American, Powers is one of several freshmen who will play big roles in Banda's quest for a national title.

"Michelle's a hard-nosed, quality player," the coach said. "She's a competitor and a fundamentally-sound player. You don't see too many of those type of girls in Massachusetts or New England. I project her as a halfback or a forward."

Other players that Banda is trying to lure to Amherst, away from Chapel Hill, are Norway's (via Virginia) Brithe Hegstad, a high scoring left wing, New Jersey's Beth Roundtree and Virginia's Wendy Gebauer, all national-quality players.

"I think we have the upper hand with Brithe and the other girls will visit here and talk to us. I'm hoping to land a few of them," Banda said.

The coach said he hopes to mold four freshmen with last year's six freshmen and four other bench players to form another national caliber squad.

"You don't need 16 good players to run at the title," he said. "I don't keep girls on the team because of seniority. If you're good, you'll be on the team. We're getting to the point where we have no room for marginal players."

Senior Lori Stukes, a sweeper back, and freshman forward Kristen Bowsher were selected as All-Americans.

Stukes, a co-captain, was named to the first team. Bowsher, the first UM freshman to make the squad, was on the third team. She scored six goals on the season. Stukes keyed a defense that allowed fewer than 0.65 goals-a-game and recorded 11 shutouts.

Bowsher,and freshman forward Jolie DePauw (14 goals, six assists for a team-high 34 points) were named as age-group All-Americans also. Bowsher, according to Banda, has collected five such awards.

"I think Jolie should've made the college team as well, but we had a great season. I think we'll see more of the same in the future," Banda said.

Gorillas 85 slate

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

It's not as far away as it seems, the University of Massachusetts lacrosse team begins action March 30.

The Gorillas, ranked 12th nationally last season, open with consecutive home games against Delaware, Cornell, Rutgers, Brown and Boston College.

They go on the road to face New Hampshire, Hofstra, Yale, Harvard and Army. The laxmen return for a game against Dartmouth before going to Hobart and C.W. Post.

Finally, on May 10 they face powerful Syracuse in what should be a war. Plan on attending now.

bench, it should benefit them for the rest of the season and maybe we can find certain combinations that work well together," Stevens said.

The women face a little easier time of it the rest of the way, they played New Hampshire on Thursday, Rhode Island on Saturday and Harvard today at Amherst College at 4 p.m.

"I think we can return to the form that saw us beat those three teams in a row," Stevens said. "This team has shown signs of improvement and I'm optimistic about the rest of the season."

MINUTEWOMEN MUTTERINGS: In the win over Vermont, Fitzgerald had 16 points with 8-of-13 shooting. Captain Jerrie Bernier added 13 points of six-of-nine shooting. Matthews had 12 as did Hebel as the women shot 55 percent against the Catamounts.

Against Lehigh, Fitzgerald had 24 points and eight rebounds, in her best effort of the season.

Fitzgerald shot 10-of-19 from the floor, four-of-six from the line and had five offensive rebounds. Burtoft had an overshadowed ten points and 16 rebounds.

The Springfield game saw UMass have four players in double figures. Hebel had 18 points, Bernier chipped in with 16, Burtoft had 12 points and pounded the boards with 13 rebounds, while Matthews had 10 points and five assists. The women blew the game open by outscoring Springfield 36-25 in the second half.

UMass swimmers cruise

Pound Northeastern and Williams

NANCY BUKAR
Collegian Staff

Although many students were idle during the break, the University of Massachusetts men's swim team was busy. After ten days of training in the Florida sun, the Minutemen posted an impressive record, beating both Northeastern and Williams.

Williams, the New England champions for the past five years, was a sweet victory for UMass. "We weren't expecting such a strong win at Williams," said Coach Russ Yarworth. As for the win against Northeastern, "We hammered them," said Yarworth with an 81-32 victory.

"We developed a good attitude in Florida as a team. . .We've really turned a corner."
- Swim Coach Russ Yarworth

After a 1-3 record for the fall season, the Minutemen are looking stronger than ever. Coach Russ Yarworth feels that upcoming meets will pose no problems for the team if they maintain their strength.

"We developed a good attitude in Florida as a team which rubbed off on the guys who didn't go. In the first semester, you're always trying to get it together--the addition of Drew (Donovan) helped a lot," Yarworth said.

Donovan, a transfer student from the University of Iowa, has posted the best time the 100-yard freestyle in New England. In addition, he place 17th in the U.S. Olympic Trials in 1980--while still in high school.

Other swimmers who have shown marked improvement since the fall include distance swimmer Paul McDonough, Steven King and Tony Baker. Mike Hoover has the second-best time in New England for the 200-yard breaststroke.

There are four meets left for the Minutemen before the Atlantic Ten championships in February. They face the University of Connecticut on Wednesday at Storrs.

"I hate middle of the week meets--the guys have classes and work and we usually have to travel," Yarworth said. "We have to swim well there."

The next three meets--Vermont, UNH and Amherst--pose no threat to the Minutemen. "They won't be too much trouble...we lost to UNH the past two years but we won't have any trouble with them this year," Yarworth said.

Divers Pat Mullen and Keith Pisani have "improved immensely" according to Yarworth. At the Williams meet, their one-two finish broke a 44-44 tie score and helped the Minutemen win.

After tough double workouts during intersession, Yarworth expects a 5-0 record for the semester.

"They've really turned the corner and now that we've got Drew, I think we're a better team than we were in the spring."

Drew Donovan:

Transfer makes big splash

By NANCY A. BUKAR

Drew Donovan may not have been able to swim competitively at the University of Iowa but now that he's been given the chance at the University of Massachusetts, he has proved himself more than able in the pool.

After two years away from swimming, Donovan, 21, already has the number one time in New England for the 100 yard freestyle. And coach Russ Yarworth believes that Donovan's time will improve even more.

"He's not at his peak yet. Drew still has a lot of work to catch up on but his sprint times are looking good," Yarworth said.

Donovan had only one formal workout in two years after he left Iowa. That was one week before the team left for Florida to workout twice a day for ten days.

"Florida was hell. It was really, really hard and I wasn't used to it at all," Donovan said.

Donovan left Iowa after his first semester sophomore year. "I flunked a class and there was a question on my grades in high school," he said. While Donovan's case was pending, he was not permitted to swim competitively with the team, only practice.

When he left for Christmas break, Donovan informed the coaches at Iowa, "If I can't swim, I'm not coming back." Two years later, he's a member of the Minutemen team.

In 1980, as a high school junior, Donovan was invited to try out for the U.S. Olympic team in the 50 yard freestyle and the 400 yard freestyle. He place 17th. "I wanted to make the consolation finals which was first through sixteenth," he said. "It was a good experience."

As for the differences in the programs at Iowa, a Big 10 school, and UMass, Donovan said, "Iowa is a lot different. The assistant coaches did all the work there and it was a bigger program. Swimming was one of the key sports there.

"But it's just as hard here. Over-distance swimming in practice was emphasized at Iowa. Here it's a lot more quality swimming," he said.

Making the NCAA nationals was the high point of Donovan's swimming career. He has one more year of eligibility to "make the NCAA's again. The best swimmers in the country are there," he said. He wants to be one of them.

Aid cuts may bar 3,000 from here

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

If President Ronald Reagan's proposal to cut financial aid is approved by Congress, more than 3,000 students may not be able to return to the University of Massachusetts in the fall of 1987.

Arthur Jackson, director of financial aid, said Reagan's proposed cutbacks for the 1986 fiscal budget would affect approximately 16,000 UMass students. The proposal asks Congress to:

- Deny federally guaranteed student loans to all college students with family incomes above $32,500,
- Impose a $4,000 ceiling in aid per year including loans and grants for any student, regardless of family income,
- Restrict eligibility of Pell grants to families earning $25,000 or more.

Students barred from the guaranteed student loan, under which the loans are free while the borrower remains a student and the interest is only nine percent afterwards, could turn into an auxillary loan program. Under this program, borrowers would be charged interest while they are in school and would be required to pay back the loan immediately instead of having a six month grace period.

Jackson said that of all the students at UMass that receive some sort of federal aid, more than 4,000 would lose their federal loans, more than 8,000 would be cut back in aid by the $4,000 ceiling and about 1500 would lose their Pell grants, annual stipends of up to $1,900.

Jackson called the proposal "a cost ceiling measure to decrease the deficit that is inappropriate and does not take the size of families with students in college into consideration."

"Education is seen as one of the areas where cutbacks can be made," he said. "This is the type of proposal that we'll see more of – it's only the tip of the iceberg. Many educational firms beside financial aid will be sharply reduced."

The Reagan administration "wants excellence to occur in higher education but is not willing to support it financially," Jackson said.

"I wouldn't be shocked to see a 40 to 50 percent reduction in our financial aid program if Congress accepts the proposal," he said.

"I can speak for all students and say that the proposal is totally unacceptable," Jim Shaw, a member and former president of Students Advocating Financial Aid, said. "It's absurd."

Shaw said that SAFA has not yet set an agenda for the semester, except to organize its lobbying efforts in Washington D.C. by late March or early April.

"The proposal is literally excluding hundreds of thousands of students across the country from getting an education," Shaw said. "No one should be denied an education based on income."

Baghouse project drags on

Fourth deadline for completion approaches

First of a series.

By IAN POLUMBAUM
Collegian Staff

The latest timetable for compliance with the Clean Air Act of 1970 calls for the "baghouse" exhaust filtration system adjoining the University of Massachusetts power plant to be "completely installed" by the end of this week, according to the state attorney general's office.

But UMass Physical Plant officials doubt that needed duct alterations will be finished by then, due to continued delays in equipment delivery and time-consuming safety precautions for making these alterations while the coal-fired steam plant is running at full winter capacity.

The Friday target date is the fourth negotiated by the attorney general's office with the University and the Mass. Department of Capital Planning and Operations which handles state construction contracts at the request of the State Department of Environmental Quality Engineering. UMass and the DCPO have previously overrun three DEQE deadlines in 1981, 1983 and last July for completing the baghouse, a building begun in 1980 which houses about 17,000 filter bags intended to catch unburnt coal before it goes up the chimney.

The DEQE has cited UMass' power plant for violation of the anti-pollution law since 1977, estimating that it emits about 300 tons of coal dust annually. DEQE Western Mass. Air Quality Chief David Howland calls this "a major violation," about five times the legal limit "for a plant of that size."

Lisa Capone, spokeswoman for the attorney general's office, said the latest date was agreed on in mid-December. "We're very happy about it," she said Monday. "The University is on schedule according to our latest schedule."

Robert Garrity, DCPO general counsel, said the Physical Plant "should be able to begin actual testing (of the baghouse)...by the end of this week."

"I'm a little pessimistic perhaps, but I don't see it happening by the end of this week," Robert Hildreth, Physical Plant project manager, said Monday.

Physical Plant Operations Supervisor Peter Wozniak yesterday predicted another 10 days to two weeks of work before testing, "and that's being somewhat optimistic."

Under a two-week old DCPO emergency sub-contract, Garrity said, the Boston Chimney Co. is working to install a series of dampers in the breaching, or ductwork, from the plant's three main boilers, so that the baghouse can be tested with exhaust from one or two boilers at a time while all three are operating.

"The real safe way to do it, "Wozniak said, "would be to shut the plant off," thus avoiding the problem of diverting 500-degree exhaust. But he said it takes three days to shut down and cool off the boilers and another half day to start them again.

He added that yesterday the Boston Chimney workers were still awaiting delivery of two electric hoists to open and close the dampers and three manual hoists to be used if the electric ones fail.

According to Wozniak and Garrity, full operation of the baghouse will in any case be preceded by a one-month testing period.

DeNyse 'wanted'

Students rap CC change

By GREG BROWN
Collegian Staff

Students have planned a noontime rally tomorrow outside of the Whitmore building, as opposition mounts against the administration's plans to take over the Campus Center.

Also, leaflets explaining the plight of the Board of Governors and depicting Vice Chancellor of Administration and Finance John L. DeNyse in a "wanted" poster will be distributed in the Campus Center/Student Union today, BOG chairwoman Jane Donohue said.

The leaflet, with a photograph of the vice chancellor smiling at the top of it, charges him with "an organized assault on student rights," referring to DeNyse's Dec. 26 mandate combining the Campus Center's trust funds and eliminating the BOG.

The "informational and inflammatory leaflets," as BOG treasurer Fran Hegeler called them, will be passed out to "any members of the University community interested in students' rights," she said.

"Students were denied input into all this from the beginning," Hegeler said. "This campaign is intended to change that...drastically."

Students will march from the Student Union, beginning at 12:15 p.m. Thursday, to picket an undisclosed entrance to the Whitmore Administration Building.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis J. Madson said he feels the demonstration will put a damper on the negotiations between students and administrators over the programming costs of the Campus Center, and who will pay them.

"My concern is to preserve the good things initiated by the BOG, such as the Craft Shop, UPC (Union Program Council), and GPC (Governor's Program Council)," he said.

Last week, at meetings between administrators and student leaders, Madson said he was formulating a proposal for a programming board, which would be comprised entirely of students and would be a supplement to the proposed Auxiliary Services Board.

Meetings between administrators and student leaders are continuing in an attempt to "encourage the best-articulated proposals from people," Madson said.

The merging of the trust funds with the trust funds of Auxiliary Services would eliminate the Campus Center fee, and funding for the Campus Center/Student Union complex would be provided by a new Universal Resource Fee.

"Students would, in effect, still be paying the rent on the Campus Center," Hegeler said.

DeNyse said last night that he had seen the flyers with his likeness. "It's a shame...I think it's rather unfair. But every group does what they have to do. We had reached some common ground this week, and it's just a shame."

Dispute continues over whether Edwin Meese broke federal law

WASHINGTON (AP)—Attorney Gerneral-designate Edwin Meese III said yesterday he has met "ethical as well as legal" standards of conduct, but a report made public at the insistence of senators concluded that he may have violated federal law.

That finding was reached by two attorneys in the Office of Government Ethics, but they were overruled by the head of the office, David H. Martin, who was appointed by President Reagan.

Martin informed the committee Jan. 24 that no ethics violation by Meese occurred, never mentioning the staff report which became known through a news account Monday.

The internal report by staff attorneys F. Garty Davis and Nancy Feathers was made public as the Senate Judiciary Committee opened new hearings into Meese's fitness to serve as attorney general.

Last year, the committee dropped action on Reagan's nomination of his longtime associate after independent counsel Jacob A. Stein was appointed to investigate allegations concerning Meese's financial dealings with associates who later won federal jobs.

Stein said there was no grounds to prosecute Meese. But Davis and Feathers drew a different conclusion when they went over his thick report.

They concluded that Meese may have violated federal statutes "prohibiting a federal employee from accepting a gift from any other federal employee receiving less pay than himself."

That was in reference to the financial aid Meese got from John R. McKean, who arranged from two loans totaling $60,000 to Meese in June and December 1981. In October 1981, McKean, who was Meese's accountant, was nominated to a seat on the U.S. Postal Board of Governors.

"Mr. Meese should not have participated when Mr. McKean came before the senior staff for approval with respect to positions on the Postal Board of Governors," the Davis-Feathers repbrt said. "He had a financial interest in the matter."

The report also cited a delay in interest payments to McKean and "the appearance of impropriety created by his Meese's activites."

FDA licenses herpes drug

WASHINGTON — The government yesterday approved the first drug designed to treat or suppress recurring outbreaks of painful herpes sores among the 5 million to 20 million Americans who suffer from genital herpes.

The Food and Drug Administration approved a capsule form of the drug acyclovir, which will be marketed under the trade name Zovirax by Burroughs Wellcome Co. It is expected to be on pharmacy shelves by mid-February, available by prescription only.

While it does not cure herpes, the drug does reduce the severity of recurring outbreaks of herpes sores and speed their healing time, the FDA and the company said in separate announcements.

In addition, the announcements said, the drug also suppresses outbreaks in many people, offering the possibility that people who now are virtually disabled by severe cases of the disease may regain control of their lives.

Boats collide in icy waters

NEW BEDFORD, Mass — A 512-foot Norwegian freighter carrying a load of apples from France collided with a docked tank barge yesterday, spilling an undetermined amount of fuel oil into New Bedford harbor, authorities said.

There were no injuries reported in the accident, which occurred about 1 p.m., said Commander Edward Cooke of the Coast Guard's Marine Safety Office in Providence.

"There was a lot of ice by dockside," said Paul Saunders, director of the port. "I guess things got out of control."

Cooke said the freighter Hidlefjord was headed to its berth at New Bedford's North Terminal when it collided with the 90-foot barge Wm. H. Bennett, which was undergoing repairs.

The barge, which was carrying less than 1,000 gallons of fuel oil, began taking on water and leaking oil, Cooke said.

UM reviews financial aid qualifications

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts officials are redefining what constitutes satisfactory academic progress in awarding financial aid, to comply with federal guidelines passed last year.

A study group comprised of administrators, academic deans and the financial aid office are working on "clarification of academic policies and standards of the ones already in place," Arthur Jackson, director of financial aid said.

During intersession a notice was sent to 16,000 students who receive some sort of financial aid to inform them that aid would be cut if they do not meet satisfactory academic standards.

The federal guidelines that the University must follow in awarding aid apply to the Guaranteed Student Loan, Student and Parent Alternate Loan, College Work Study, National Direct Student Loan, Pell Grants, Supplementary Educational Opportunity Grant and the State Incentive Grant.

Students who are on academic probation and later cannot maintain a 2.0 grade point average and carry a minimum of 12 credits, face the possibility of losing all federally funded aid unless they meet the "extenuating or mitigating circumstances" the study group is evaluating, Jackson said.

"It is the intent of the federal government that students are monitored by their progress and University expectations," he said. "We must enforce from within before the government imposes their own guidelines."

Jackson said all UMass students receiving financial aid are audited every two years to ensure that they are meeting satisfactory academic progress, he said.

"We just had our two year audit," Jackson said. "The first thing they checked on was our academic policy. The University is liable to pay back to the department of education if our policy is lacking."

Jackson said that the results of the study would be available this semester and that all students receiving financial aid would be notified by letter of any changes.

Smith College hires new president

By DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

The presidency of Smith College will change hands July 1 when Mary Maple Dunn succeeds Jill Conway, who is leaving to multi-volume history of women in America.

Dunn is currently a professor of history and dean of the undergraduate college at Bryn Mawr, a small all-women liberal arts college in Pennsylvania.

"I'm excited and nervous at the prospect," said Dunn in a telephone interview from her office at Bryn Mawr on Monday, admitting she was daunted by what she described as "the magnitude of the job."

"It's a lot of responsibility," she said, "and I've never had to take such responsibility before."

The appointment of Dunn was announced on January 16 after a 10-month nationwide search in which more than 500 applicants were reviewed.

Dunn never applied for the Smith presidency but was contacted at Bryn Mawr by the search committee to ask if she would be interviewed for the position.

At first, Dunn was not sure she actually wanted to be a candidate, but, she said, "the more I learned about Smith the more interested I became."

For Dunn, who is especially interested in women's education, the opportunity to assume the presidency of Smith, the largest all-women's private liberal arts college in the United States, was particularly attractive.

She believes that "the experience of being in an institution where women are in charge and where the major concerns are women's lives, careers and minds gives women students an education of "special strength," she said.

Town rejects Air Force plan for antenna

By LESLEY CLARK
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Board of Selectmen voted Monday night against Air Force plans to construct within the town a radio tower and transmitting facility which would communicate with other areas in the event of a nuclear attack.

Three of the five selectmen opposed the plan, citing the town's anti-nuclear sentiments, the disruption of the landscape a 300-foot tower would create, and concerns about the costs of policing the facility. Lack of information from the Air Force about the facility prompted two selectmen to abstain from voting.

The Air Force has the option of overriding the selectmen's decision, although Lt. Col. Dale Condit said earlier that the Air Force would comply with the town's decision.

Fred Steinbeck, one of the selectmen who abstained from voting said, "If we oppose the plan we will lose whatever we could gain in bargaining," referring to the fact that the Air Force had agreed to go before the Zoning Board although they are not legally bound to.

Selectman Allen Torrey said, "if the town has a firm committment against the facility, it should voice it. Let's stop this now, by telling them we don't want it."

Chairwoman of the Board of Selectmen Barbara Griffith said the vote "aptly communicated the town's opposition to the plan."

The proposed site for the facility, on Stanley Street in South Amherst, was the object of criticism. Allen Torrey called the location, 1.2 miles from the center of Amherst, "an intrusion on our landscape."

The proposed facility, a 300-foot tower equal in height to the University's tower library, is part of a $122 million system designed to provide a communication system after a nuclear attack.

Alumni will teach courses next fall

By PHIL SERAFINO
Collegian Staff

Two University of Massachusetts alumni, one a trust of the University, have been named adjunct visiting professors for the fall of 1985.

William G. Dunn, a 1950 UMass graduate who is currently the publisher of U.S. News and World Report, will teach courses on marketing and communications management in the School.

A seminar titled "Management of High Technology" will be taught by Andrew C. Knowles, corporate vice-president of Prime Computer Company in Natick and a trustee of the University.

Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey said he is "delighted at the prospect of having two of the alumni of the University return to share their experience and expertise with our students." He also said he hoped for further appointments which would bring alumni to the campus to teach for short periods of time.

As a long-time supporter of the University, Knowles also serves on the recently-formed Chancellor's Executive Committee, a group of alumni who have achieved prominent roles n American life and serve as advisors to the chancellor.

Knowles also serves on the University Relations and Development Committee and the School of Engineering's Dean's Advisory Council.

Knowles is a 1957 graduate of the School of Engineering and received an honorary doctorate in engineering from the University in 1982. His contributions to the University include the establishment of several scholarships and gifts of computer equipment to the School of Enginering. Knowles ll not be paid for teaching at UMass.

While teaching at UMass, Dunn will also serve as an advisor to Chancellor Duffey and other administration officials on how student education and internship programs can be conducted more effectively.

The 60-year-old Rye, New York resident was also awarded an honorary doctorate in public service in 1981 from the University.

Yale settlement called landmark
'Victory' for comparable worth

By DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

The clerical and technical workers at Yale University are back at work this week, having won their first union contract that many see as a landmark victory for the issue of comparable worth.

"I don't think comparable worth is going to be solved in one situation," said Dale Melcher, adjunct lecturer at the Labor Center at UMass, "but to the extent the strike at Yale made comparable worth a national issue and legitimized it, the union may claim a victory."

The union, Local 34, went on strike Sept. 26, charging that Yale was participating in a national pattern of discrimination against women and minorities, paying them less than the male workers at Yale holding comparable jobs.

"The economic discrimination comparable worth addresses is that women and men do different work which is differently valued," said Melcher, adding that women's labor is undervalued because of employer's "gender assumptions."

Elaine Sorenson, economics professor at UMass, agrees that "wages are not only determined by supply and demand but also by employers' assumptions."

As an example, Sorenson suggested that many employers assume women work for "pin-money" and thus feel justified in paying them low wages.

"Paying someone on the basis of their sex and not their contribution constitutes discrimination," she said.

According to Sorenson, "Yale was interesting because it was the first private sector strike for comparable worth that got national attention," and such it "heightened the issue that women's pay is too low for what they contribute."

The contract ratified last week by Local 34 provides an average salary increase of 35 percent over three and a half years, retroactive to July 1, 1984, as well as a complicated salary structure provision composed of 17 steps through which workers will progress.

This last provision is particularly important, said Sorenson, because "all too often women get stuck in low paying jobs that have no steps and thus no chance of promotion." Consequently, "Twenty years later a women may be earning the same wage as when she started," Sorenson said.

Tom Keenan, a union organizer and graduate student at Yale, described the outcome of the dispute as "terrific."

"The settlement is fantastic," he said, adding "It proves what you can do when you get together, organize, and stick together."

"Comparable worth" — the concept that jobs of equal value should receive equal pay — arises because of the large differential in the earnings of men and women and their persistent segregation in the labor force. As the above statistics show, women tend to work in lower-paid jobs than men, even though the work they both do may be comparable in terms of the skill, responsibility and effort involved. It is this economic discrimination that comparable worth seeks to address.

"Comparable worth is an issue around which women can organize," said Melcher, and Sorenson said she believes that "Yale made women more aware of comparable worth and more aware of the need to join and form unions to fight for it."

When Keenan was asked what made Yale finally settle, he replied, "It was a number of things. Public pressure was a big factor

"Yale's reputation took quite a beating at the hands of the national and international media," he said, "and it was clearly hurt by that."

He also suggested Yale was "staring at the prospect of not admitting a freshman class next year because many of the admissions applications hadn't even been opened," letter-opening being the responsibility of the clerical worker of Local 34.

Poland prosecutor urges executions

TORUN, Poland (AP) — A government prosecutor demanded the death penalty for a secret police captain he said was guilty of carrying out the premeditated kidnapping and murder of a pro-Solidarity priest with "ruthlessness and cruelty."

Chief Prosecutor Leszek Pietrasinski, in closing arguments for the state, said Capt. Grzegorz Piotrowski's two subordinates were manipulated into taking part in the slaying of the Rev. Jerzy Popieluszko. He said the two lieutenants should be sentenced to 25 years in prison, but that their lives be spared.

Execution in Poland is by hanging.

The prosecutor accused the fourth officer charged in the killing, Col. Adam Pietruszka, of conceiving and planning the attack and asked the court's five judges to sentence him to a 25-year prison term.

Piotrowski appeared stunned as the prosecutor spoke. He supported his head in his hands, then threw his body into his chair, leaned back and stared ahead. Tears streamed down the face of his subordinate, Lt. Lesznek Pekala, and Lt. Waldemar Chmielewski buried his head in his lap. Pietruszka listened impassively.

The prosecution's final arguments came on the 22nd day of the trial in this northern Polish city near where Popieluszko was abducted and slain Oct. 19. The decision by a communist government to conduct a public trial of security police in the death of a dissident was also unprecendented.

Pietrasinski said the testimony in the trial had shown the killing was an isolated act that damaged the reputation of the Interior Ministry and did not have high-level ministry support. The ministry controls all Polish police.

But he told the court that the trial had neither "confirmed nor excluded the existence of instigators."

"Perhaps we are talking here about specific persons, but one thing is certain, the higher-ups are not in the Interior Ministry," Pietrasinski said.

He said the possible instigators perhaps are people either inside or outside the Polish government who oppose the policies of Polish leader Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski.

Pietrasinksi's remarks seemed to indicate that no ther officials would be charged, but left open the possibility of changes in the government or Communist Party leadership.

Authorities issued 10 passes to Western correspondents to attend the trial but denied access to The Associated Press. Reporters in the courtroom provided the AP with their notes and the AP has protested its exclusion from the trial.

But Dunn is also attracted to other aspects of Smith, such as its 2,600-member student body which she described as the "perfect size."

"It's large enough to be viable" she said, "but small enough to be a community of people."

Dunn received a bachelors degree from the College of William and Mary in 1954 and a Ph.D. in history from Bryn Mawr in 1959.

The author or editor of numerous articles and books on Colonial American history, including "William Penn: Politics and Conscience," Dunn has devoted her most recent research to the study of women and religion in Colonial America.

She will be moving to Northampton in July. Her husband, Richard S. Dunn, a distinguished history professor at the University of Pennsylvania, will visit her on weekends.

Jill K. Conway, who has been the president of Smith since 1975 and who is leaving to work on a multi-volume history of women in America, said on the day Dunn's appointment was announced that "Smith is fortunate that such a distinguished scholar and academic leader will assume its presidency and shape its future."

Alumni receive awards

Oriole pitcher Flanagan, author Theroux lauded

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Staff

BOSTON The University awarded its highest alumni award Friday night at a lavish celebration in the Copley Plaza Hotel.

Guests at the Troy Awards included Gov. Michael S. Dukakis and Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey. One of the two recipients was not present.

Michael K. Flanagan, Class of 1975, was to receive the award along with Paul E. Theroux, Class of 1963. Flanagan is a left-handed pitcher for the Baltimore Orioles and former recipient of the Cy Young Award; Theroux is a distinguished author of fiction and travel books.

Flanagan recently injured his Achilles tendon and could not attend.

The Troy Award is given each year to honor UMass graduates who have distinguished themselves outside the University in art, science, business, or sports. The award is named after Frederick S. (Barney) Troy Class of '31, who is serving his 23rd year on the Board of Trustees and is chairman of the Trustees' Committee on academic and Student Affairs.

Flanagan's parents, Edward and Maureen, of Manchester, N.H., accepted the award for michael, who also holds the University record for hitting three consecutive home runs in one game.

"Today, you honor him the day after an injury that may end his career," Edward Flanagan said, "and it is with great honor and pride that I accept this award for him."

Accepting his Troy Award, Paul Theroux said that while he was a student, "I felt an obligation not only to study, but to get involved."

Theroux said that his parents taught him to take nothing for granted, and that "you have to earn what you've got and I don't take this award for granted. It makes me feel very welcome."

State representative James Collins, D-Amherst, presented state citations to Flanagan and Theroux. Also in attendance at the dinner were UMass President David C. Knapp, Trustee Chairman Robert H. Quinn, Boston Globe editor Michael C. Janeway, Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey, and UMass faculty, administrators, and alumni.

Shopper shuttle renewed, bus will swing through town

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

The town of Amherst will co-sponsor a shopper shuttle bus with the University of Massachusetts Transit Authority this semester to attract more shoppers to the downtown area.

The bus will cost the town $835 per semester, according to Al Byam, operations manager of the Transit Authority.

The shuttle, which will run six times a day on Friday and Saturday only, will begin operating this Friday. The route will run from Puffton Village, down North Pleasant Street, through downtown and down Route 9 to the Stop and Shop Plaza.

It is the same route that was used during intersession.

"That is what we wanted," Amherst Town Manager Barry Del Castilho said. "We wanted the bus to go through the center of town so people could consider stopping in the center of town and not just going Price Chopper or Stop and Shop."

Last fall, the undergraduate and graduate student senates sponsored a shopper shuttle that ran down University Drive to Price Chopper and Stop and Shop.

The town, through the transit advisory board, requested that the shopper shuttle be re-routed through downtown, Byam said.

Court hears prostitution charge

A University of Massachusetts student charged with promoting child prostitution will have his pre-trial conference in Hampshire District Court today.

Brian A. Stacey, 27, of Worcester pleaded innocent to that charge and one count of larceny under $100 at his Dec. 17 arraignment. Stacey was arrested Dec. 16 in the Campus Center following an investigation of an alleged larceny and he was charged as a result of that investigation, according to UMass police. No further details were given.

A charge of promoting prostitution alleges that one "did induce a minor to become a prostitute or did knowingly assist in the inducement of a minor to become a prostitute."

Stacey's pre-trial conference was originally scheduled for last Wednesday, but the case was continued for a week at the request of the assistant district attorney, Rosemary Tarantino.

Letters

Pets are people too

Because of the huge number of lost pets and abandoned animals this winter, some 1985 resolutions for pet owners seem appropriate. For example:

First, I resolve that my dog shall wear its license tag and an identification tag at all times. The former allows the police or dog officer to locate the owner. The latter which gives the owner's name, address and telephone number makes it easy for a finder to call the owner directly. Small tags are available for cats, too.

Second, I resolve that I will spay or neuter my dog or cat to make it a more serene and stay-at-home pet and to prevent unwanted litters of puppies or kittens which contribute to the huge population of stray and abandoned animals.

After these technical steps, on a more compassionate level, I resolve, third, that I shall not only provide food, water and shelter but also a daily form of exercise and fun to welcome my pet companion into my family life which it so desperately wishes to be a part of.

Fourth, if it seems to have behavior problems beyond my control I resolve to examine my own attitude and treatment and if necessary ask outside advice.

Fifth, and finally I resolve never under any circumstances to abandon it. I shall either give it up for adoption to a more compatible owner or have it humanely put to sleep because I know that, like me, my dog or cat feels pain, hunger, cold and loneliness.

Pretty good, but...

As a faithful reader, I should like to congratulate this year's Collegian staff for so far having maintained a generally higher standard of objectivity than in recent years. I've also enjoyed the somewhat greater range of coverage, and hope you will continue the good work.

One suggestion: Might the Collegian do some investigative reporting and expose work?

OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

When the cat's away...

Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance John L. DeNyse announced a plan December 26 to combine the trust funds of the Campus Center, Conference Services, and the University's dining commons. Under the plan, the 32-member all-student Campus Center Board of Governors (BOG) would be eliminated and replaced by a 16-member Auxilliary Services Board comprised of faculty, staff, alumni and students.

The timing of the announcement and the implications of the consolidation for students create grave questions concerning the administration's willingness to listen to and solicit student input into matters directly involving students.

We as students demand to know why DeNyse chose to wait until the week of finals to call a meeting between himself, Campus Center administrators, and the director of Auxiliary Services and why the Vice Chancellor then decided to wait until the week after finals to announce a major decision invovlving student control of the Campus Center/Student Union complex.

Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey has said the timing was partly his fault, as his late semester trip to Argentina kept DeNyse waiting for him. If that is the case, two points arise: One, did the entire University shut down for a week while Duffey was abroad? Two, if the decision was a matter that could be postponed until Duffey returned then why couldn't it be postponed until students returned?

Decisions concerning who runs a building that is financed by student money cannot be made after a semester has ended without an effort by the administration to seek student input. If what students have to say carries so little weight with Whitmore that administrators would make no effort to allow students a voice in how a building constructed for students will be run, then why even bother having students sit on the proposed Auxiliary Services Board?

The consolidation proposed reaffirms a belief widely-held on the part of the administration that the purpose of the Campus Center should be to serve the needs of outside individuals with an emphasis on the hotel and restaurant aspect of the building. But the original purpose of the building, as stated in a yearly "mission statement," is to serve "as a point of crossover where members of faculty, staff and the student body and from the larger Commonwealth community might come together to pursue a common interest or to engage in some common recreational activity."

We believe the Campus Center should remain a building for students, with students actively participating in the decision-making process on a day-to-day basis. We also believe no major decisions concerning students should be made by an administor without his attempting to solicit student input.

We should not, as students, live in fear that our administration will go behind our backs and make a decision when few, if any, students are on campus.

Jack DeNyse owes students an explanation.

Student input under fire

Fran Hegeler

They did it again. Last semester it was the Coffee Shop, this time it's bigger — much bigger. While we were busy with our finals on December 22, the Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance was in a secret meeting with other top level administrators, talking about the Campus Center. One of the things they decided, was that the Division of Administration and Finance was no longer interested in funding "programming." What this means is that starting in July '85, they will not fund the Campus Center/Student Union Board of Governors, the Campus Center Craft Shop, the Student Union Art Gallery, the Governors Program Council, and UPC shows in the Student Union Ball Room and Blue Wall. Simply stated, Jack DeNyse and his division are wiping out of the Campus Center everything that deals directly with students, despite the fact that students pay for the building in a variety of ways.

Have you ever seen a concert in the Ballroom? It's the only place on campus where we can have big dance concerts. No more funding for those. Have you ever been to the Campus Center Craft Shop? With quality instruction to assist you, you can create all sorts of things just for the price of the materials. Better go there soon, it may be gone in July. Have you ever been to the Student Union Art Gallery? It's the only art gallery on campus dedicated specifically to display student work. It too, could lose funding. How did you feel about the U Store moving their clothing line into the Coffee Shop? Maybe we ought to get used to the idea. With the student Board of Governors dissolved, things like that could occur without a hitch.

After you get over the initial shock and outrage to such an audacious move on the part of the Division of Administration and Finance, you will probably want to know WHY. The answer is simple (as well as simply unacceptable): The Division of Administration and Finance has decided that it is no longer in their interest to program. Their only interest in the Campus Center is to see that the maintenance and operation of the building is smooth and efficient. The bottom line is that they want little or nothing to do with students and student activities.

The irony is striking. According to the Campus Center's Mission Statement, the major focus of the Campus Center is "students." That is as it should be — after all, we pay for it directly and indirectly. We have always paid, and will continue to pay, the debt service on the bonds. This is the "rent" for the Campus Center that shows up as a fee on our bill as $84 per year. It's mandatory. Nonpayment results in administrative withdrawal. Things don't stop there. The profit that the University makes from the Textbook Annex goes into the Campus Center. We are the primary market for everything the Campus Center sells, from food and coffee at the Hatch and Coffee shop to UMass sweatshirts and magazines at the U Store, to beers at the Bluewall and T.O.C. There's no doubt that students pour lots of money into the Campus Center.

There is also no question that student input into the management and policies of this building can be (and has been in the past) very beneficial for the administration as well as for students. After all, who knows better how the Campus Center can serve students than students?

However, beyond the obvious benefits of student input there is a question of student rights. Our money pays for this building, our voices have a right to be heard.

So now what? We say we have a right to have a student voice and student activities in the Campus Center. They say we don't. We have to show the Division of Administration and Finance that we mean business. If you want the Craft Shop, Art Gallery, GPC's Comedy Nights, UPC's dance shows in the Ballroom, Blues in the Bluewall, and the Campus Center Board of Governors to continue there are a number of things you can do. You can stop by our table on the Concourse and sign a letter of protest, come to the Rally in front of the SU building Thursday at 12:15 p.m., or make a call to the Board of Governors office. Or maybe you should just call Vice-Chancellor DeNyse at 5-1581 and tell him how you feel about his recent decision.

Registration: a new sport on campus

It happened. I couldn't believe it. I, like 20,000 other students, went to my mailbox like any other day, with one exception: my course schedule for this semester was due in today's batch.

As I ripped the envelope neatly across the Whitmore return address, I saw the now familiar green paper that is supposed to guide me through my daily classes.

I opened it up to see Communications 301 — OVERSUBSCRIBED.

Great.

Fearful, my eyes lowered their gaze to the next course, Public Relations in Journalism — COURSE CLOSED.

Great.

Quickly, I scanned the rest of my courses and saw that five out of six courses were either OVERSUBSCRIBED or COURSE CLOSED. Either way it meant one thing — I don't have my classes for the next four months. The green sheet that was supposed to help me through the semester had turned into Green Death as far as I was concerned.

The number of hours spent agonizing over what courses I wanted to take vs. what I needed to take for my major vs. what courses my parents wanted me to take, all for nothing.

I began to envision the folks at Whitmore in charge of scheduling dressed as devils with fire and smoke all around them, laughing hideously as they said, "Here's Dode Levenson's schedule! Let's (snicker) screw up his entire (more snickers) semester! Ha ha ha ha!" Great.

The response to how this happened according to the administration is spoken in the tongue of Whitmoreaise which is something like: "The total number of students divided by the total amount of classes times the amount of time each professor can spend with a student individually shows obviously that every student cannot just get every class, and I think this explanation displays that unequivically." Great.

Meanwhile back at the ranch, I don't have any of my classes, and Whitmore can take responsability for a new intramural sport: Registration. I will be out there all this week fighting tooth and nail for my chance to learn and get a seat in the class. Just great.

Kinks mellow out

THE KINKS
Thursday, December 20
Hartford Civic Center

By PETER WISSOKER
Collegian Staff

Once again the Kinks are mellowing out. This isn't the first time and it probably won't be the last. With the departure of drummer Mick Avory after some twenty years with the band the Kinks continue to produce, but where there once were guitar lines sustaining the rhythm there are now synthesized pianos, which don't have the same gripping effect.

For this tour the Kinks have done away with the horn section and a lot of Dave Davies' guitar solos. On that Thursday night late in December when the Kinks played Hartford it seemed like they were still breaking in their new drummer, Bob Henrit. The songs they played were taken mostly from their last three albums with only two songs from Low Budget and nothing from before 1970 except "Lola," "You Really Got Me," and "All the Day and All of the Night."

The Kinks have a new string of hits: "Do it Again," "Paranoia," "Come Dancing," and "State of Confusion" which seemed to be what the majority of the primarily younger audience wanted to hear. These were the songs which were played and received with the most enthusiasm.

Some of the highlights of the show were "The Hard Way," "Do it Again," "Low Budget," and the Batman Theme which they played before "(I Wish I Could Fly Like) Superman." During "Superman" Dave Davies stole Pete Townsend's guitar lick from "Shakin' All Over" on Live at Leeds. It was a shameless act, worse than their ripoff of "Jumpin' Jack Flash" or "Catch Me Now I'm Falling."

But lets face it. It is always rewarding to see the Kinks because no matter how mellow or off they are on a given night, they are still a lot of fun.

Not quite as much fun was opening act, Tommy Shaw, now ex-Styx. Shaw played about six songs from his new album, Girls with Guns the "Too much time on my Hands" and "Renegade." While the songs aren't stagnant, the choice of how the chords change invites the term cliche, which is a shame because he has some potential.

Kinks' mastermind Ray Davies

New and returning Arts Staffers: We will have our first meeting Thursday, February 7 at 7 p.m., time to be announced.

Artslines...

The native folk music of South Afica will be presented in a free workshop on Saturday, February 2 from 2:00-6:00 p.m. in Bezanson Recital Hall at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. The event is sponsored by the Performing Arts Division and is funded by a grant from the University Arts Council. The audience-participation workshop will include an introduction to the music of the ethnic groups in South Africa, an exploration ol the various techniques displayed in the music, a demonstration of songs and dance, and the relationship of native folk music to the different South Africa musics, and to Western and Greek usic. A Admission is free and is limited to available seating. For complete information, please contact the Performing Arts Division, Old Chapel, UMass, 545-0519.

The annual Louise Rood Memorial Concert, entitled "New Oysters and Old Pearls," will be presented by members of the Five College Early Music Program and guests on Saturday, Feb. 2, at 8 p.m. in Smith College's Sage Hall. Performers for this program of English and Italian Renaissance music include soprano Jane Bryden, lutenist Catherine Lidell, and viola de gambists Robert Eisenstein, Jane Hershey, Alice Robbins, and Peter Tourin. The concert is free and open to the public.

Baritone Rodney Gisick, assisted by pianist Dorothy Ornest will perform works of Purcell, Schubert, Ibert, Wolf, Hoiby and de Falla at a faculty recital at Amherst College on Sunday, February 3 at 3:00 p.m. The concert, presented free of admission charge, will take place at Buckley Recital Hall.

The Performing Arts Division will be presenting a Faculty Ensemble Concert on Sunday, February 3 at 3:00 p.m. in Bezanson Recital Hall. The Concert will feature the premiere performance of a work by Joe Marceloo written especially for performers George Baker on clarinet, Amy Rose on flute, and Carin Alexanderson on clarinet. Also included on the schedule are trio performances of works by Aurik and Mozart on clarinet, oboe, bassoon, viola and piano. For more information call PAD at 545-0519.

At Home by the Fire, a series of three Sunday afternoon concerts by area musicians, will be presented during the month of February to benefit the Amherst Ballet Theatre Company's 1985 Eastern European tour. Performances are scheduled as follows: On February 3, Estella Olevsky, pianist of the UMass Faculty of Music and Dance, will perform a selection of her favorites. On February 17, the Madrigal Singers of the University of Massachusetts Department of Music and Dance will perform under the direction of Wayne E. Abercrombie. On February 24, Nikki Stoia and Grant Moss of the Smith College Faculty of Music will perform a four-hand piano concert. All performances will be held at 3 p.m. at the Grannis home, 26 Sunset Ave., Amherst. A $10 donation is requested for each concert. Wine and cheese will be served. For reservations and further informatin call 549-5952, evenings.

Herter spring showings

The following is a listing of events scheduled to take place at the Herter Gallery this semester. The Gallery is opened for viewing Monday through Friday from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. and Sunday from 2 p.m. to 5 p.m.

From February 1-17, an Art Faculty sabbatical exhibit of offset lithography by Hanlyn Davies will be presented. Next a Jewish Arts Festival will be held from February 22 through March 15, featuring "Ten Jews of the Twentieth Century," silkscreens by Andy Warhol. Also showing in the Herter Gallery from February 22 through March 15 will be an international exhibition of shopping bag graphics. Master of Fine Arts Thesis Exhibitions will appear from March 24 through May 3, and the Gallery will close its season with an art students show (an awards exhibition) from May 6 through May 18.

Swimmers crush URI 77-35; first time since '78

By NANCY A. BUKAR
Collegian Staff

The Minutemen were dominant once again as the University of Massachusetts men's swim team defeated the University of Rhode Island Rams by a score of 77-35 on Saturday.

It was the first time in six years that the Minutemen beat URI, a win that was especially significant to Coach Russ Yarworth, who was a senior when UMass last beat URI.

In addition, two pool records were broken by Drew Donovan and Craig Fuller. Donovan established a new time for the 200-yard free style and Fuller broke his previous pool record in the 200-yard butterfly.

Unlike meets in the past, Yarworth had all his swimmers healthy and free from workloads to swim at their best.

The meet got off to a good start with the 400 yard individual medley relay. The Minutemen "A" team was neck and neck with URI until the final swimmer, Donovan, overtook URI and won the race with a time of 3:40.68. The Rams placed second with a 3:43.17.

In the 1000 yard freestyle, URI's Chip Church took first place with a 10:02.11 and Jim Flannery came in second with a 10:16.50.

Donovan proved his superiority once again in the 200 yard freestyle. His time of 1:44.89 not only won the race but broke the Boyden record. In the 50 yard freestyle, Fuller poured it on to take first in the 50 yard freestyle with a 22.75 and URI's Joe Colbert took second with a 22.81.

The Ram's Roger Schendne took first in the 200 yard individual medley by less than a second with a time of 2:01.21. UMass' Mike Hoover placed second with a 2:01.75.

In the one-meter diving UMass' Pat Mullen and Keith Pisani showed their style by taking first and second with scores in the sevens. They improved the score at this point by eight points.

Fuller excelled in the 200 yard butterfly, taking first with a pool record of 1:55.30. The Ram's Tad Holloworth took second with a 1:58.55.

In the 100 yard freestyle, Hoover showed his determination by coming from behind and winning with a time of 49.78. Roger Schenone of URI took the 200 yard backstroke with a 2:00.43.

Fuller took first in the 500 yard freestyle with a 4:50.30 and Church of URI took second.

Pisani and Mullen proved themselves once again with a one-two finsih in the three meter diving, again adding eight points to the Minutemen score. Hoover then took the 200 yard breast stroke with a 2:17.37 and Fred Marius took second with a 2:18.68. UMass dominated the Rams in the 400 yard freestyle relay; the team of Paul McDonough, Flannery, Eric Schmidt and Donovan finished five seconds ahead of URI.

The team faces UConn tonight at Storrs. Yarworth said, "We'll have to swim hard again but we should win."

Milum, who enrolled in school this semester as a freshman, will have four years of eligibility starting next January. The 6-9 rebounder from Madison, Conn. was recruited out of high school by Boston College, Marquette, Connecticut and UMass.

He averaged 25 points a game in high school and according to Gerlufsen is a good rebounder and aggressive player.

Milum red-shirted his first semester at Iona. He was a Street and Smith Magazine All-American and joins Cardinal Gibbons High's David Brown as the two UMass recruits already signed.

Intramural Sports Notices

The Intramural office is still taking entries for basketball and ice-hockey. The season started tonight, late entries should go to Boyden 215 as soon as possible.

There will be a meeting for basketball officials on Wednesday at 7 p.m. in Boyden 215. The hockey officials meeting is Thursday at 5 p.m.

UMass forward Bobby Braun had 20 points and 17 rebounds in a 72-68 victory at Rhode Island.

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

The last time the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team won two-out-of-three road games, Jack Leamen was head coach and Mike Pyatt was the star.

Six years, two head coaches and a 38-127 overall record have since passed, but this past week the Minutemen did it again and those days of despair may be over.

Last Tuesday, UMass started its three game road trip with an 84-78 victory over Dartmouth.

Thursday saw a tough George Washington team edge UMass 69-59 and drop the Minutemen to 3-4 in the Atlantic 10.

But on Saturday, Bobby Braun scored 20 points and pulled down a career-high 17 rebounds as UMass handed Rhode Island a 72-68 defeat in Kingston.

The win lifted the Minutemen to a 4-4 mark in the Atlantic 10, good enough for a tie for fourth place with George Washington and St. Joseph's.

West Virginia, with an upset victory over Temple, moved into a first place tie with the Owls. Both are 7-1. Rutgers, a UMass victim, is in third at 6-2.

"Our goals are still the same, improve on our standing last season," UM coach Ron Gerlufsen said. "Maybe later in the season we'll say 'let's get third or second,' but right now we're taking every game individually and looking to keep up the pace we've set."

The Minutemen have taken three-of-four games and stand at 8-9 on the season. They finished 6-12 (seventh) in the league last year and 12-17 overall. The goal to improve seems in reach.

Against the Colonials in Washington, UMass held the lead until the 6:48 mark of the first half and stayed close, trailing 32-28 at halftime.

GW forward Chester Wood scored 24 points, 18 in the second half, to sink UMass. Four UM players hit double figures led by Donald Russell with 19, Carl Smith with 13, Horace Neysmith's 12 and Braun's 11 (and eight rebounds).

The Minutemen rebounded with a big victory over the Rams at Kingston on Saturday. New head coach Brendan Malone found himself in trouble from the start at UMass ran off seven quick points to grab an early 9-2 lead.

UMass maintained that pace, leading 40-30 at the half as Braun scored 14 points with dominant inside play. He also had 11 rebounds. Russell, who along with Neysmith has hit for double figures in six straight games, has seven points.

The second half saw the Rams creep back into the game, behind the play of forward Tom Garrick and guard Tony Tucker, URI cut the UMass lead to three, 68-65 on a Carlton Owens jumper from the baseline with 2:43 to go.

URI scored but one hoop the rest of the way as the UMass defense clamped down, and the offense ripped off four insurance points.

Braun was 8-of-15 from the floor and had six offensive boards. Neysmith had 14 on 5-of-8 shooting. Russell had 12 and Smith added 10 and four assists. Freshman Lorenzo Sutton has eight points.

Matt Ryan contributed 13 minutes of solid play with four points. Tom Emerson, Ron Young and Jack Sheehan also looked good.

UMass shot 50 percent from the field, but continued to struggle from the line at 54 percent. Neysmith also had five steals.

"Neysmith and Russell are showing a lot of leadership on and off the court," Gerlufsen said about his co-captains.

"The team is showing a lot of improvement and doing what I'd hoped we could do when the season started. I'm very pleased."

MINUTEMEN MUTTERINGS: UMass has added the much-needed big man for next season with Iona transfer John Milum.

Minutewomen cruise to second straight, 74-57

Hebel closes on 1,000 as Harvard falls

By JOHN A. NOLAN
Collegian Staff

Juanita Matthews and Barbara Hebel combined for 37 points as the University of Massachusetts Women's basketball team trounced Harvard, 74-57, last night at Amherst College.

In winning their second straight game, the Minutewomen, 8-11, took advantage of sloppy Harvard ballhandling (27 turnovers) as well as a poor shooting performance (38.9 percent). Throughout the game the Crimson were plagued by foul trouble and an inglorious effort (13-25) from the foul line.

Harvard took a 5-2 lead during the first four minutes of the first half thanks to good inside play as the Minutewomen were unable to get on track. Harvard's consistency was, however, left back in Cambridge as the Minutewomen awoke to take a 9-5 lead behind five points from Karen Fitzgerald and buckets by Hebel and Matthews.

Hanya Bluestone came off the visitor's bench contributing five points as Harvard regained the lead at 15-9. The lead held until the 3:35 mark of the first half when Matthews tied it at 24. Harvard's bubble then burst. Matthews caught fire scoring 10 of her game-high 20 points in a span of just over two minutes as UMass forced many Crimson turnovers en route to a 22-1 run that closed out the half.

In the second half, attentions of the crowd turned to Barbara Hebel as her trek to become the third player in the history of Minutewomen basketball to score 1,000 points found her just 13 points shy. Four consecutive Harvard turnovers led to quick baskets (by UMass captain Jerrie Bernier and Fitzgerald) and a 14 point Harvard deficit as the Minutemen slowly buried the Crimson beneath its own self destructive play.

"They got into such foul trouble that they were never able to get into the pressing game plan that I thought we would see," said UMass assistant coach Nancy Hogan.

For the game, UMass won the battle of outside shooting over Harvard, by a paltry 39-38.6 percent from the floor while hitting 24-of-36 (66.7 percent) from the line.

"It wasn't an artistic performance," said Stevens. "But I was pleased."

On Thursday, freshman Taara Lewis, in just her third start, scored 18 points and had nine rebounds as the Minutemen defeated New Hampshire 69-57.

Hebel had 17 in the game as UM snapped a five-game losing streak. They took a commanding 41-28 lead at the half and never trailed as UNH committed 31 turnovers. UMass outrebounded the Wildcats 36-23.

Start me up: UM teams prep for rest of season

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

It was a rough January for the women's gymnastics, men's gymnastics and women's swimming teams, but several University of Massachusetts athletes did turn in good efforts.

The women swimmers defeated Amherst for their first victory, 91-49 as Liz Feinberg, Nan Stephens, Margaret Cameron and Colleen Martin contributed to the rout of the cross-town rivals.

The Minutewomen then lost to Boston College, Williams and Northeastern to fall 1-7. Feinberg is undefeated in all her individual races this season and is first in New England in the 200 free (1:57.75) and highly ranked in the other freestyles and the individual medley.

The UM women gymasts lost a tri-meet to Maryland and URI and a dual meet heartbreaker 170.05-169.04 to Northeastern.

Sue Allen, Jennifer Pancoast and Christine Cloutier have been looking good for coach Chuck Shiebler's 2-5 team.

Pancoast was second in the all-around against the Huskies with both Allen and Cloutier debuting new routines.

The men's gymnastics team traveled to Annapolis and lost to the Naval Academy 265.1-252.25 on Friday.

The Minutemen fell to 3-1 with the loss but got good performances from Stan Gatland on the floor, rings and parallel bars, Phil Gorgone on the floor (9.05), Ken Dougherty on the horse (9.2) and Joe DeMarco with a 9.1 on the floor, good enough for fourth against a good Midshipman squad.

This week, the women swimmers face Rhode Island at home on Friday at 7 p.m. at Boyden, the men gymnasts are at Dartmouth today and the women gymasts face Ivy League powerhouse Cornell Saturday at home, also in Boyden.

Coffee shop conversion plan halted

By JOHN VINCENT
Collegian Staff

The Campus Center Coffee Shop will not be converted into the clothing department of the University Store, as proposed last semester Campus Center Director William Harris said.

Harris said last week that he realized before the end of last semester that the Campus Center would not benefit from extending the clothing line into the coffee shop.

"I decided (not to expand the University Store into the Coffee Shop space) because of the obvious opposition by members of the student body that made me feel that this was not the best move from a public relations standpoint," Harris said.

Harris said the Campus Center administration would have jeopardized the "student confidence in the way the building is managed" if it approved the proposal. He said it was more important to preserve the "goodwill" of the students than to go ahead with the move.

"It's evident there's a core of students that use the Coffee Shop that would have been very disappointed," he said.

In a study conducted by the Campus Center administration last semester, it was determined that a raise in the drinking age would mean a loss of up to $300,000 in alcohol sales revenue for the Campus Center. An expansion proposed by the University Store to move its clothing line into the Coffee Shop's space would have earned the needed revenue, Fran Hegeler, board of governer's treasurer said.

The BOG conducted a survey of students in the Campus Center in December which found that the majority of the approximately 3,000 students surveyed felt they needed the Coffee Shop for a place to eat, study and socialize.

Many students also said they would boycott the University Store and sign petitions requesting that the Coffee Shop remain if they had to.

Harris said he made his decision before he got a chance to review the sruvey.

Although a commission studying the impact of the increased drinking age is not considering any other proposals, the Campus Center will be turning to new sources of revenue to make up for the expected loss, Harris said.

Union files complaint for equity

by LAURA KOESTER
Collegian Staff

The union which represents maintenance and food service workers at the University of Massachusetts has filed a complaint with the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) charging that some women workers are paid less than men in similar jobs because of discrimination based on sex.

Local 1776 of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME), said that positions filled primarily by women are underpaid relative to similar positions filled by men.

The local claims that institutional domestic workers, assistant cooks and cleaning service matrons enter at grade 5 with a salary of $237.07. While janitors enter at the Grade 8 level with a weekly salary of $258.66.

The complaint charges that, "The University of Massachusetts and the Board of Regents of Higher Education discriminatorily assigns employees to different job classifications on the basis of sex and maintains sex-segregated job classification systems."

The other part of the complaint alleges that UMass "paid and continues to pay...women less for performing substantially the same work as men."

The complaint is the first step toward a possible law-suit, said Jonathan Tuttle, president of local 1776, which could be more than a year away.

The next step is up to the federal commission, which will refer the complaint to the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination (MCAD) for review. MCAD will then ask the union for a detailed report and seek a response from the UMass administration and Board of Regents.

According to Tuttle, a similar complaint was filed in 1978 but AFSCME did not bring a lawsuit. Now, Tuttle says, "If Council 93 won't do it, we'll do it ourselves." Council 93 is composed of all AFSCME locals in the state.

Tuttle said that if necessary the local will decline to send the council its share of local members' dues and will use this money to pay legal fees. This amounts to $7,980 per month, said William Herbert, treasurer of the local.

James Coopee, director of personnel administration at UMass said "We don't segregate by sex. If it ends up that there are more women in those positions, it's because more women apply for them."

Coopee said UMass attorney Sid Myers told him not to release information about the number of women employed in particular jobs without a request in writing, which would then be discussed and responded to. He also declined comment about what would happen if pay scales at UMass were based on comparable worth.

Ron Sinecore, staff assistant in the affirmative action office, said, "there is no question that there is sexual discrimination. Equal pay is not paid for similar jobs."

Joseph Bonavita, executive director of Council 93, said in a telephone interview that he would prefer to continue negotiating the issue with the Board of Regents. Chages of discrimination would then be argued on a case by case basis alleging contact violations rather than a lawsuit, he said.

However, Tuttle said, "We've already tried bargaining...We made a verbal request to the administration to upgrade food service employees by one grade." Both moves, he said were unsuccessful.

Metric system conversion would save US billions

By JOEL P. COFFIDIS
Collegian Staff

George Washington once recommended the use of metrics and the Metric Act of 1866 authorized the system, yet the United States is one of only four nations in the world that has not fully adopted it.

Evan V. Johnson, director of the Northeast Metric Resource Center, which is temporarily located in Room 922 of the Campus Center, said that a study conducted from 1968 to 1971 by the United States Department of Commerce determined that the U.S. should adopt the metric system. The study concluded that American businesses were losing billions of dollars a year.

Johnston, a 1950 graduate of the University of Massachusetts, said that because the U.S. is a leader in industry and technology, the failure to completely convert to metrics is causing $4 to $5 billion yearly in trade losses. He added that besides the U.S., only Brunei, Burma, and the Yemeni Republics remain outside the metric system.

"This country is going metric whether it likes it or not," Johnston said. "We cannot remain a single island in the world."

The reason for the losses, Johnston said, is that in foreign trade, the U.S. has to run two seperate lines of product, one in each measurement system.

"We lost 85 percent of our trade to South America because our products are more expensive because of the need of the two measurements," Johnston said.

"The big companies have been phasing out the old-fashioned measurement system," because of their companies losses, he said.

But Johnston said, "The average guy on the street doesn't want to learn something new. The biggest problem is coordination between government, business, industry and consumers. The consumers are the ones getting ripped off."

Former President Gerald Ford signed the Metric Act of 1975, which was a step in the right direction, Johnson said, but "it lacked national coordination". However, the act was contributing to a definite need in educating people on metrics, he said.

The act created the U.S. Metric Board, which had an annual budget of $2.5 billion. But President Ronald Reagan dissolved the board when he took office in 1981.

"The amount of money that was being spent in coordinating the changeover to the metric system was so minute compared to the benefits we would get in the years to come that it seemed to be ridiculous to cut it at all." Johnston said.

Executions are on the rise

WASHINGTON (AP) - For the past 20 years, executions in the nation were rarities. Now they occur, on average, once every 10 days - and that rate is speeding up.

James David Raulerson, who died in Florida's electric chair Wednesday, was the fifth person executed in the United States this year.

Law enforcement officials are reluctant to predict how many condemned murderers will die this year, but scores of death row inmates are perilously close to losing their battles to stay alive.

There were 11 executions in the first seven years after the Supreme Court in 1976 allowed states to reinstate capital punishment. In the last 21 weeks, however, there were 15.

At first, time was on the side of the inmates. There was only one execution in 1977: none in 1978; two in 1979; none in 1980; one in 1981; two in 1982; and five in 1983.

But last year, states put to death 21 inmates. Now, in the first 30 days of 1985, five have been executed.

Woman named president of professors union

By DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

Professor of English at the University of Massachusetts, Arlyn Diamond, has "a sense of being snowed on by little pieces of paper and phone calls" she said, ever since she was officially named as the new President of the Massachusetts Society of Professors last week.

Diamond, who replaces journalism professor James Boylan who resigned to go on a sabbatical, looked with dismay at the piles of papers accumulated on her desk and said, "It's going to be a real test of my abilities to keep organized."

But Diamond brings to her new position abilities other than those needed to cope with little bits of paper, plentiful union experience.

The MSP, affiliated with the Massachusetts Teachers Association, is the union representative for the faculty members at UMass-Amherst and UMass-Boston, with some 1,400 members on this campus.

A major task of the union is "to bargain a contract every three years" said Diamond. The contract covers such issues as "salaries, benefits, working conditions, affirmative action and a whole range of other things," she said.

Asked what she saw as the major issues she would have to address during her term, she replied that "early retirement, patent policy, salary and benefits are most immediately apparent."

UMass professor Arlyn Diamond

"We may wish to do more with affirmative action," she said, adding that "improving the status of women is definitely on the agenda."

"Other issues may arise though, such as support for faculty in terms of research funds, travel money and the sorts of basic things members of a university faculty should be entitled to," she said.

Diamond, a graduate of Berkley, has been teaching at UMass for 17 years, is the first woman to assume leadership of the MSP. This will not mean "any major differences in policy," she said.

Although she would like to see "more women and minorities active in the union," she also said "I'm active and there have been a number of women active in the union since the beginning."

Diamond was in the team that bargained the current faculty-librarian contract, she has been a delegate to state and national conventions, and has been a campus leader on the issue of affirmative action.

Asked whether she would still have time to pursue her own research interest, women and middle-English literature, Diamond scoffed and replied, "If you spend your time thinking about patent policy, it's difficult to think about middle-English saints' lives in the thirteenth century."

Coal pile pollutes area brook

State slow in action

By TOM MIDDLETON
Collegian Staff

The Commonwealth won't begin the project ot keep the University of Massachusetts coal pile storage by Tillson Farm from polluting the Taylor Brook and surrounding farms until April, although the original deadline for construction was set a year ago.

A report from the UMass department of enviromental sciences points to the coal pile as a source of sulfuric acid in the stream. According to farmer Fred Wentworth, three of his cows died last August from drinking in the brook, the only source of water on his farm besides his tap.

Although no direct medical link was made between the water and the death of the animals, Wentworth said, "It's something in the water ' that is responsible for a "lack of production" among his cows. Wentworth runs his family's farm, where he has lived all his life.

In July 1983, the town Conservation Commission ordered UMass to remove the coal pile. Later, the town agreed to a temporary solution allowing the pile to remain.

The commission gave UMass a May 1984 deadline to build a solution. The University then said it could not begin construction until the funding was approved by the State Department of Capital Planning and Operations.

UMass maintenance workers and Staff Industries of Detroit will construct the $150,000 temporary solution in which the polluted water draining from the coal pile will be collected and pumped through two lime filters to a sedimentation pond and then into the town's sewerage system.

Once the construction is finished, the coal pile will be washed down with (sodium lauryl sulfate) a detergent. "If construction begins April 1 then we won't begin spraying until about July 1," said Roger Cherewatti, director of the UMass Physical Plant.

The DCPO has made a $58,876 contract with SCIABA Construction for the purchase of a pumping system. The department has also awarded a $11,750 contract to Staff Industries to build a curb around the coal pile to direct the run-off to the catch basin and pumping station.

A third contract for the construction of a test well has not been awarded according to Jack Bradshaw, deputy commissioner of DCPO.

The test well will collect polluted water which has already seeped into the ground and pump it into the filtering system.

The project will cost the University about $10,000 in indirect costs, Cherewatti said.

The permanent solution to the problem which was also designed by Green International Affiliates, will call for the installation of a permanent liner under the pile to prevent run-off from seeping into the ground.

According to Cherewatti, the pile will be divided into thirds, and each spring one third will be used up and part of the lining installed until the lining is complete.

Students seek regents rep.

By MICHELLE HYDE
Collegian Staff

If all goes well for the Student Government Association Public Policy Committee, there will be a student member of the state Board of Regents of Higher Education by next fall, according to Public Policy co-chairwoman Stacy Roth.

A new draft of House Bill 1369which calls for a student regent, outlines for the first time the selection process and addresses past concerns of Regents and Legislators, Roth said.

The Board of Regents is presently a 15-member body appointed by the governor that sets policies and oversees operations for the state's 29 public colleges and universities, and is responsible for about $500 million, or six percent of the state's budget.

Public Policy's bill would increase the membership to 16, to include the student regent, and would establish in statute the already existing Student Advisory Commission, which iscomprised of student members of the Board of Trustees.

While the Regents appointed by the governor serve a five-year term, student Regents will serve a one year term, according to the proposed legislation.

In a letter to David J. Beaubien, chairman of the Board of Regents, Public Policy co-chairs Roth and Beth Harrington wrote, "Providing a student (board) member would increase the accountability of the board as a whole. The student membership would prevent closed meetings and force the Regents to be more open" to the public.

Beaubien had said he thought it would be difficult to select one student to represent "the separate missions" of community colleges, state colleges and universities, and to provide a sufficient orientation period for new student Regents.

But the selection process outlined by the new bill is "as good a solution as any I could come up with," Beaubien said.

According to Roth, the appointments will operate on a three-year rotation. The first year, the student regent will be a student from a university; the next, a student from a state college, and the next year the regent will be a student from a community college. Each institution will nominate one student for review by the Student Advisory Commission, which will nominate three students. The governor will appoint one student out of the three.

According to Harrington, the proposed selection process itself provides for an orientation period. The nomination deadline for the Commission will be Feb. 1, five months before the student becomes a voting regent on Oct. 1. The actual length of the orientation period will depend on how quickly the governor picks one of the three candidates, she said.

The Public Policy Committee is now working with other student lobby groups, the State House and Senate Education Committees, and is pushing to have a public hearing scheduling by mid-March. This may be difficult because of the number of bills that have to be considered in the legislative session, Harrington said.

Beaubien said Tuesday that the Regents' Academic Affairs Committee passed 4-2 a motion to recommend that the board endorses the presence of a student regent rather than endorse the specific bill because it will probably be modified.

He said he thinks that students are making good progress and that "it's a matter of how quickly the legislature passes it."

COOKED BEER VS. FRESH BEER.

Back in the days when boxers fought with bare knuckles, there was no such thing as bottled beer or beer in cans.

Those were the great days of draft beer, fresh from the keg.

Like the draft they brewed at Frederic Miller's old Plank Road Brewery. It had a smooth, fresh taste that just got better, round after round. Like those early pugilists themselves.

A taste that's hard to find in today's bottles and cans. Because most beers, in bottles and cans, are pasteurized. Cooked to 140 degrees to preserve their shelf life. So they lose that fresh, draft taste.

But now there's a bottled beer that's not cooked. It's specially cold-filtered instead. To keep the true taste of fresh draft.

Introducing Plank Road Original Draught. It tastes as fresh from the bottle as it does from the keg.

Faculty and student senates kick-off semester

Student senators condemn BOG dissolution

By JOHN YONCE
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Senate of the Student Government Association last night voted unanimously to send a letter to university officials condemning the proposed dissolution of the Campus Center Board of Governors in the Senate's first meeting of the semester.

The board would be eliminated as part of a plan that would consolidate the trust funds of the Campus Center, Conference Services and the University's dining commons.

"It's an administrative attack on a governing student body," BOG chairwoman Jane Donohue said. Donohue spoke before the senate to ask for support in today's protests of the takeover. She urged senators to "blow off classes" to join in the protest.

In earlier business, the senate voted after close to two hours of debate to approve the joint funding of a heterosexism trainer. The vote was 34-25 in a secret ballot.

A senator said he requested the secret ballot because some senators might oppose the motion on a moral basis. Two senators must request a secret ballot for it to be held.

The SGA coordinating committee voted over intersession to fund the trainer jointly with the Vice-Chancellor of Student Affairs. The vote was made subject to the approval of the full senate, through the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy. The senate voted down two similar motions last fall after some senators said funding was not available because money set aside to pay for an oppression educator was not used because the position went unfilled.

Opponents of the motion voiced concerns over where funding for the educator would come from in the future, and what would happen if the administration didn't fund its half in the future.

Proponents of the measure spoke of a responsibility to the student body, and a need to impress the administration.

"I, personally, will have difficulty meeting with administrators if this motion is not passed," Chris Sullivan, speaker of the senate said. Sullivan stepped down from the chair during the debate to speak on the motion. He said the senate needed to present a "good face" of unity to the administration to keep respect.

The senate was approximately half through the agenda when the meeting was adjourned because quorum was not met when called at about 9:30 p.m., two and one half hours after the meeting started.

Rep. Collins addresses faculty senate today

By LESLEY CLARK
Collegian Staff

Rep. James D. Collins (D-Amherst), will speak today on "moving the University into the top ranks" in his address to the first faculty senate meeting of the semester.

Collins will address the importance of the state in the University's budget, and the state's need to "properly fund the University to ensure full development of the learning base in Massachusetts."

Collins will also speak on the University's relationship with the state Board of Regents of Higher Education. He is currently working with students to create a student regent position.

Collins, a 1968 graduate of UMass, said the University emerged 15 years ago as one of the top 20 as a state institution in the nation and "the next step is to move the University into the top ranks."

"Massachusetts, the nation's leader in education should also have the leading state University," he said.

Search to begin for new SOM dean

A search for a new dean for the University of Massachusetts' School of Management (SOM) will begin tomorrow. The current dean, Harry Allen, is stepping down in August to return to the faculty.

The search committee is looking for a dean who will be able to confront the problem of overcrowded classes in SOM and establish ties with professional businesses.

A 13-person search committee that held two confidential meetings last semester decided that the new dean will also seek private businesses for advice and economic research, said Ronald Mannino, accounting professor and committee member.

For the past two months, advertisements have run in The Wall Street Journal, New York Times, The Boston Globe and in business journals.

The advertisement requests an effective administrator with a record of professional achievement in business, government, or higher education. A doctorate is preferred but not required.

Jim Leheny, assistant to the chancellor and a committee member, said he expects more than 100 applicants.

The salary for the position will be determined by the candidate's education and experience. Allen presently earns about $65,000 yearly.

"The University of Massachusetts is a fine school, I hope we get the best man for the job," Allen said.

Allen, who has been SOM dean for seven years said it is time to return to teaching. He taught courses in management for 14 years and has been an administrator for 15 years.

Leheny said the committee hopes to fill the position by fall semester.

Ninth Jewish festival today

By KAREN POLLENS
Collegian Correspondent

The ninth annual Jewish Arts Festival, beginning tomorrow, will feature examples of Jewish culture worldwide, along with lectures, movies, dance, music and painting.

The month-long festival is sponsored by Hillel, a campus organization that promotes awareness of Jewish culture.

"One of the things Hillel does is to try to share the totality of the Jewish life with the campus. One way for people to understand the Jewish experience is through seeing Jewish art, hearing the music, and appreciating other aspects of Jewish culture," said Hillel director Rabbi Saul Perlmutter.

The Festival will open with the showing of "Yentl", starring Barbara Streisand, at 7 p.m. Monday in the Student Union Ballroom.

On Tuesday, Art Waskow, author of "Seasons of Our Joy", a book that re-examines Jewish history and customs, will conduct a Tu B'Shvat service that combines the traditional focus of nature and the passage of the seasons with such topical themes as ecology and nuclear war. The service will be held at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday in the Commonwealth Room of the Student Union.

Voice of the Turtle, a Boston-based group, will perform the folk music of Sephardic Jewry on Thursday, Feb. 21, in the Student Union Ballroom. The event is co-sponsored by Ahora and the Department of Spanish and Portuguese.

Elie Weisel, author of "night" and "Dawn" and chairman of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Service, will speak at 8 p.m. on Monday, Feb. 25, in the Campus Center Auditorium.

UMass student arraigned on new charges

A University of Massachusetts student charged with promoting child prostitution had that charge against him dismissed yesterday at a pre-trial conference in Hampshire District Court.

But, Brian A. Stacey, 27, of Worcester, was then arraigned on a count of prostitution payment for sex. A charge of larceny under $100, which accompanied the child prostitution charge, still stands.

Stacey was arrested Dec. 16 in the Campus Center after a larceny investigation, according to UMass Police. No further details have been released.

The case has now been continued to Feb. 13.

Collins will also address the importance of a comprehensive athletic program.

Senate Secretary Robert D. Jones said Collin' address to the senate is important because, "as a public university, the budget is in the hands of the state legislature, and its essential to know what's going on."

As a result of student complaints about unstructured courses the senate will vote on a proposal which would provide professors with guidelines for improving courses including a provision for date syllabus; outlining of course objectives; grading criteria, and requirements for papers and exams.

The guidelines, however, are not mandatory.

Govs. endorse 21

DANBURY, Conn. (AP) - A call for unity in raising state drinking ages to 21 and a condemnation of Reagan administration mass transit budget cuts were approved Wednesday by governors from six Northeastern states.

The governors of Connecticut, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York and Pennsylvania also called on Congress to act quickly to free up interstate highway funds.

The six governors, meeting as the Coalition of Northeastern Governors, also called on the federal government to continue to help pay for construction and repairs to roads, bridges and water and sewer projects. Rhode Island also belongs to the coalition, but Gov. Edward D. DiPrete was unable to attend because of the death of a state legislator.

Massachusetts Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, the moving force behind the call for a unified increase in drinking ages to 21 by June 1, said he picked that date because of its nearness to prom time and high school graduations.

In December, the New England governors endorsed a similar call.

At Wednesday's meeting, New York Gov. Mario Cuomo said he also favors the Dukakis approach, despite a legislative setback last year in raising the legal age to buy alcohol.

He said that federal law that requires states to set drinking ages at 21 by September 1986 or face the loss of federal highway money will be a major incentive to the New York Legislature.

Convict shot in scuffle

LEOMINSTER (AP) - An escaped convict was shot Wednesday in a scuffle with a trooper who had stopped the car he was riding in for a traffic violation, a State Police spokesman said.

A car driven by Robert F. Berube, 36, of Worcester, was stopped by Trooper Paul M. Russell, 27, on Route 2 at Route 12 about 8:55 a.m. and shots were fired, Boston-based State Police spokesman Sgt. Jim Sartori said.

David M. Aquafresca, 36, an escapee from the Shirley House of Correction was in stable but critical condition in the intensive care unit of Leominster Hospital, nursing Supervisor Irene Creed said. He was shot in the spleen area of the abdomen, she said.

Aquafresca was serving time at Shirley for armed robbery and possession of machine guns. He was reported missing Dec. 13, said Worcester County District Attorney John J. Conte.

"We're going to present all of these matters possibly to the March Worcester grand jury. There will be several charges," Conte said.

Student rights 'DeNysed'

John L. Ruddock

As a concerned student and member of the Student Government Association (SGA), I am writing to you with great concern about the recent efforts by the vice-chancellor of Administration and Finance and the director of Auxilliary Services Trust Funds, and to eliminate the Board of Governors. As this proposed merger was conceived and developed primarily by the Administration, and seems to be to the sole benefit of the Administration, I write in response to the lack of solicitation of student input regarding this matter.

As the Board of Trustees has guaranteed the right of student input in the policies and decisions affecting the University, (see Trustee Statement on University Governance, Doc. T73-098) Vice-Chancellor DeNyse's failure to seek out student input seems an abrogation of this right. During a performance review of the current Campus Center Trust, the Senate Ways & Means committee of Massachusetts State Legislature stated that the Campus Center Trust Fund is "insufficiently accountable to students, even though students provide the bulk of the trust's income," and that "the student body...should be given greater, more formal voice in the complex's operation". If the vice-chancellor's reorganization plans are carried out, what will happen to student rights?

As the Campus Center and Auxilliary Services trust funds are both supported by student fees, and as many of the facilities that are supported by these funds are provided primarily for the use of students (e.g. Campus Center/Student Union Building, Dining Commons, 'Munchies') it seems terribly inappropriate for vice-chancellor DeNyse and Auxilliary Service's Director Ashoke Ganguli to negotiate the reorganization of student resources without seeking student input. Since this proposed merger of trust funds was never discussed with student leaders and since the SGA would not have found out about the vice-chancellor's plans were it not for several overheard conversations, this question must be asked: just when were you planning to let us know of your reorganization efforts, Mr. Vice-Chancellor? And while you are struggling with the answer to that question, respond to this query: As one of the results of the proposed reorganization with be the elimination of the student-run Board of Governors (BOG), where exactly does your commitment to student rights and student empowerment lie, Mr. Vice-Chancellor?

For those of you who, along with the entire SGA, didn't know, the proposed "mainstreaming" of the trust funds will result in the elimination of the BOG. The BOG has a long history of student involvement, thru managerial/administrative functions, such as:

-space allocation within the CC/SUB complex for over 450 student organizations, clubs, and vendors;

-administrative supervision of the daily operation of the CC/SUB complex

As the BOG has a long-standing positive association with the SGA, leaders of both organizations are alarmed at the potential precedent that such an elimination could create. As the elimination of the BOG would constitute grounds for relegation of student-controlled authority to the Administration. This precedent would not only contravene the Trustee-delegated authority of student input, but would seriously endanger the level of student empowerment which presently exists. As a national leader in student rights and advocacy, can UMass allow such a circumvention of student rights• And, perhaps more importantly, is vice-chancellor DeNyse, as an employee of the University with the Trustee-delegated responsibility to "...adopt the principle of joint effort in governing the University," actually carrying out this objective? Is Mr. DeNyse's proposed reorganization, and the subsequent elimination of the BOG, going to help foster this principle?

What's your opinion, Mr. Vice-Chancellor? The student body would like to get your...input.

Soviet abuses ignored

Stephen C. Erickson

Towards the end of the previous semester, near finals time, unfortunately, Dr. Robert Simon, the first American doctor to travel within Afghanistan following the Soviet invasion, gave a presentation at our University. Afghanistan and the Soviet presence there is something we hear strangely little about, particularly on our campus where activists seem to prefer talking about "U.S. Imperialism" and the evils of multi-national corporations. Dr. Simon's presentation was about the one real imperialist nation left in the world, the Soviet Union, and its brutal repression and abuse of the people of Afghanistan.

Put simply, the Soviet Union and its puppet Afghan government are waging a war against a civilian population unparalleled in contemporary conceptions of brutality. The Soviet strategy is to literally depopulate the Afghan countryside by utterly destroying villages and terrorizing the population. Approximately one-third of the population has been forced to flee and is now located in refugee camps in Pakistan.

Among the most shocking of the atrocities committed by the Soviet Union is its war on children. In order to break the morale of the parents who are sometimes engaged in fighting the Soviets, objects resembling toys but containing explosives, are being dropped from airplanes. These objects are picked up by curious children, they explode, and result in the loss of hands, arms, and/or blindness. Except for a few hidden hospitals that Dr. Simon is engaged in setting up, there are no medical facilities outside the relatively small Soviet-controlled areas. The Soviets have bombed them all. By hurting the children, the Soviets hope to break the will of the adults fighting to expel their invaders.

Dr. Simon showed one slide of a young boy whose arm had been doused with gasoline and set afire by the Soviet troops. The doctor explained that this practice is commonplace, as the Soviets will burn one appendage after another in front of the child's parents until the parents divulge the information the Soviets desire.

The human atrocities committed against the Afghans are like no other in the world today. Dr. Simon's slides and presentation brought first-hand evidence of this to our very campus. Yet, following the presentation, the reaction from a student in the back of the room incredibly was, "...but what about the U.S. action in Vietnam?" It was if he were desperately groping to find a defense of the Soviet Union by claiming the U.S. was equally evil. Someone else in the room even referred to the Afghan freedom fighters as "counter revolutionaries." The close-minded dogmatism of the left on this campus never ceases to amaze.

While the left cries out against so-called U.S. "oppression" in Central America, the holocaust in Afghanistan, not to mention all other forms of tyranny associated with the Soviet bloc and its allies are ignored. If they really care about human rights, why do they not encourage the U.S. government to help the Afghan people? If divestment can be used as a weapon against the government of South Africa, it could be used as a greater weapon on the Soviet Union, a more evil government, which is even more dependent on foreign trade.

The hypocrisy of the political left can only be explained in their need to paint the Soviet Union as a reasonable entity. Should the notion that the Soviet Union really is evil and can therefore not be trusted ever become apparent, then the disarmament dreams of the liberals will most likely be shattered. And so for the sake of their dreams, they close their minds to the tortured people of Afghanistan.

Snared by a racist system

Deborah Kutenplon

Last semester an all-white group from UMass engaged in civil disobedience to protest the nuclear arms race. After we had been arrested and put in the police van, a Black man inadvertently crossed the police barricade on his way to the store. The police grabbed him and threw him against the van as they arrested him, treating him more roughly than they had treated any of us. Yet he had nothing to do with the protest.

If I had innocently crossed the barricade, I know I would have been given a warning and a chance to back up. When I leave home in the morning, I do not worry about ending up in jail. I do not fear arbitrary arrest. It never before occurred to me to fear the law. But then I'm not Black or American Indian.

What must it be like to know that at any time you might be approached by police officers and required to give an excuse for your very presence? Or that you might be arrested on the most damning of evidence— your skin color? Ask the Amherst man who was accosted several times by the police and finally taken into custody because he seemed suspicious; he wore dreadlocks. Ask the local police departments which allegedly used to keep on file the photographs of each Black teenager in town. Ask the American Indian nations who know that one-third of their people will spend time in jail and every other family has a relative who will die there.

I imagine that living constantly under suspicion leads many people of color to wonder if our legal system exists not to protect them but to protect from them. Why should a society believe it needs protection from a whole group of people unless it also knows underneath that those people have not been allowed a fair deal?

A white woman, Victoria Safford, who spent a month in jail last year for a peace action, said of her time behind bars:

"In jail there's some clarity that's obscured out here. In jail, most of the women were young and black, many of them were junkies. Most of them ought not to have been there at all, and the few that should have been, should have been in the hospital, not in jail...These women had no power in jail; they were at the mercy of male guards, white guards, armed guards. [The women had] no self confidence, no dignity, no purpose, no training, no skills, no rehabilitation. And it's very clear that 'you're under our power, you have nothing, you deserve nothing, and we will lock you in at night.'

"But I think that that's essentially the life that they were leading on the outside, it's just no one says that. I mean, we have this free country. But it's the same prison. It's almost worse on the outside."

Our legal system—jails, courts, laws, police—is surely racist. Our legal system is also merely a reflection of our society, and of ourselves. We all have work to do.

Question of the week

Each Thursday, the Collegian will ask readers a question of the week and will print some of the responses the following Thursday. Please respond to the Collegian by next Wednesday. Letters must include the author's name, be typed, and due to space limitations, 100 words or less. Longer responses cannot be published.

Question of the week:

Recently columnist Ann Landers asked women readers "Would you be content to be held close and treated tenderly, and forget about the 'act'?" Of the more than 90,000 women who responded, 72 percent said yes. Of those, 40 percent were under 40.

The question for this week for all readers, male and female, is "What would you rather, 'the act' or would you be content with simply tenderness?"

Day after day, students' rights, rights their older brothers and sisters fought for, are becoming obsolete, taken away without even a fight. For students the time is now, the battle is real. For students, it has become a

Call to Arms

When Argentinian troops tried to wrestle control of the Falklands from England, a nation rallied around their Prime Minister.

When Ronald Reagan said students' lives were in jeopardy in Grenada, a country raised the flag and supported their President.

Rita Murphy

A crisis has a peculiar way of drawing people together. But when a crisis occurs, when a war is declared, people come together. People of different backgrounds, beliefs, cultures, people of different worlds always seem to come together for a cause. People love a good cause, even if they don't believe in it or even understand it. More than anything else, people love a good fight. And fighting for a cause is the ultimate high.

Recently a different call to battle has been sounded. A call to fight, to fight for a cause. Students have come under attack, not for anything they have or haven't done, but for what they are: students—that peculiar sort of being that might one day grow up to be a person.

It started, or continued depending on how far back one wants to go, when the Supreme Court ruled it constitutional for teachers and administrators to search students' personal belongings if they have "probable cause" to suspect illegal activities.

Then came Ronald Reagan's proposed budget cuts which, according to Arthur Jackson, UMass director of financial aid, would affect approximately 16,000 UMass students, denying federally guaranteed loans to students with family incomes over $32,500, put a ceiling of $4,000 on aid per year for all students, regardless of family income and make it virtually impossible for students from families earning $25,000 or more to obtain a Pell grant, regardless of how many family members are in college.

Here at UMass, war has been declared on 16,000 students. The bomb has been dropped and the fallout threatens students, those receiving aid and even those not receiving aid.

Jackson was right when he said Reagan "wants excellence to occur in higher education but is not willing to support it financially."

When those students who are academically able to gain admission to colleges and universities are denied the opportunity because of economic hardship, then higher education ceases to be a place for intellectual thoughts and ideas and becomes, instead, an arena for the display of wealth and status. Universities were founded on the principal that ideas are meant to be shared not merely displayed.

Students have fought long and hard for financial aid. Here at UMass, Students Advocating Financial Aid take a yearly pilgrimage to the nation's capital to rally support for their cause, the cause of the students, the cause of access to higher education, the cause of poor people, the cause of the middle class, the cause of the upper class, the cause of parents, the cause of the 60s, of the 70s, of the 80s, the cause of peace, the cause of war, a war against students.

The war is real. The war is here, now. It's a war against us. A war that threatens us. A war that pits "them" against "us". A war in which they have the artillery but we have the cause. The cause is here. We need only to recognize it. We need only to ready for battle. It'll be bloody, but the cause is worth it.

Idea predated the demands

In Tuesday's Collegian it was stated that a new course OHI 291C, "Lesbians and Gay Men in U.S. Society, 1950s-1980s", is being offered as part of the University's response to the demands of the People's Gay Alliance and other campus groups. That report was inaccurate.

The seminar was proposed well before the public demands of last December. The instructor, Paul Vasconcellos, is a graduate student in the School of Education and a professional staff member with Housing Services. He proposed the course because he saw a match between his academic specialty and student needs and interests. The course was approved through both Orchard Hill and the HS/ABS curriculum review processes because of the instructor's qualifications and the substantive content of the course. We greatly resent any implications that the course is being offered as part of the administration's response to anyone's demands.

Finally, OHI 291C is not the first course that we have offered dealing with issues of sexual orientation. We simply consider such offerings as part of our ongoing social issues programming. While it's true that we devote most of our resources toward general education courses for first year students, we continue to offer courses that help our students live at a socially diverse University.

Pity to those in scheduling

Those poor people in the Scheduling Office! Taking the brunt of many vengeful, irate students who, once again, only got 2 of the 21 credits they pre-registered for. But, before you get out your blow torches and grenades, and head out for good 'ole Whitless, please note: The Scheduling Office does not cancel your classes. Nor do they "close" your classes (ie. set criteria for which students can be let in). They also do not draw the deadly red line through your name on the class rosters. No, fellow students, the truth is even more treacherous than you suspected. Your own major department are the fiends responsible. Yes, it's the School of Business (SOB), SORRY, SOM that "red-lines" the finance seniors out of finance classes. It's the communications department who sets the criteria for "closing out" students. In fact, those people at Scheduling are so generous and wonderful, that they (the computer, too) sign everyone into all the classes that they preregistered for!

If you get cut out, it was probably due to the heartless scheduling people in your major! You just can't trust anyone these days! Well, now that I've exposed the real culprits, I can spend the rest of my day/week trying to get into "Child Development" (Ugh! Yuk!) since "Organizational Behavior Management" and "Industrial Psychology" were both cancelled. (I only waited 2 years to take them, and now I'm graduating...) So, let the psych department and all others beware now that we know who is responsible for all the needless chaos and "mucky mucking around."

Letters — Feeling pain for humankind

As Almighty God, I greet you:

A few decades ago, articles appeared in newspapers proclaiming that God is dead. I repeat: I created time so how can I be dead? I proclaim that I am alive and not dead as many mongrels would like to believe.

Some mongrels and atheists vehemently doubt my veracity. Bastards are always a nuisance to me but I cope with humanity in accordance with their sin.

Newspaper editors and publishers—with their punitive attitudes— have me baffled and make my heart sad because they do not write about my Son and I being alive in this dimension of time and light. Do ye not know that I am a God of love and not only fear?

Many people ask why I do not intervene in politics and worldly affairs. I reiterate: Virtue must take its own true course—right or wrong! Some of my quotes are repetitious. I use them not sparingly but to emphasize fact.

There is a glimmer of a tear in my eye which makes my heart sad and heavy laden, when my Son and I read in the newspapers of children dying from malnutrition, disease and poverty in foreign countries like Africa, India, South America, Central America and others. With billions of dollars spent in this frightful upgrading of arms, there are no bread and supplements to feed the poor and the hungry. Death in these foreign countries is a way of life.

With sadness, I must end this letter of understanding. My holy spirit, which is in my Son's body, must bid you anon. With a solemn prayer on my lips for a brighter future, I remain emphatically your living God. As you know, my holy name is never written on paper. My Son will sign this letter to keep hope and love alive.

Leader of the band

By PETER WISSOKER
Collegian Staff

How is it that well known musicians who have been around for years can't seem to hire musicians who are competent. At Leon Russell's show at Pearl Street his guitar player was terrible, and in a rhythm and blues ensemble the guitar player is essential.

Leon Russell became well known in the late sixties as a result of his work with Eric Clapton, Bob Dylan and George Harrison. His version of "Jumpin' Jack Flash-Youngblood" was the show stopper at the Concert for Bangladesh. But now he has become the leader of yet another glorified bar band.

Fronting a seven piece band, Russell played for about two hours a combination of covers, from 'Purple Rain' to 'Mystery Train' and originals. The music is heavily gospel influenced and it was on these gospel songs that the band came alive. Interspersed with the gospel tunes were his hits, 'Tightrope', 'Stranger in a Strange Land', and some traditional songs, 'Tennessee Waltz,' 'Georgia on My Mind,' and 'Wild Horses.'

The music was centered around Russell's down home New Orleans style playing with the bass and drums off-setting the syncopation of piano. The guitar was intended to further move the music along by playing off of the sub-rhythms of the piano but the guitar player couldn't play fast enough and often he didn't even try.

Some of the high points of the show were 'Purple Rain' because of the sheer wierdness of it all, 'Mystery Train,' a gospel rave-up 'Down in Mississippi,' and 'Abeline'. At the beginning of the show it seemed like it was going to be a lot of fun and Russell seemed to be a first rate mood manipulator, which is always fun, but once he played 'Tightrope' things slowed down and never really got started again.

On the whole it was an OK show; nothing great. Pearl Street is a nice place though, and it was fun just to go out and dance even if it was just for the first twenty minutes of the show.

Leon Russell sang the blues at Pearl St.

Welcome back. It was a pretty good intersession for music up here for a change. This column will serve as a what is, what was, and what will be going on around UMass in popular or semi-popular and semi-obscure music.

This intersession brought all kinds of stuff up here. Roger McGuinn played at Mt. Holyoke, bringing tears to the eyes of the members of the audience who took that trip down memory lane. John Cale played at the Iron Horse which brought tears to the eyes of the guy he kept spitting on as he sang. That actually was a pretty good show, kind of twisted, but the entertainment was there. Most people didn't know what they were in for and seemed kind of confused at the end.

Upcoming events include rap groups Run D.M.C. and Dr. Jeckyl and Mr. Hyde at the Student Union Ballroom on February 8, Jorma Kaukonen at the Iron Horse on Feb. 4, James Brown at Pearl Street on Feb. 13 and Albert Collins at the Rusty Nail on Feb. 14.

The Great American Blues Legends Tour will be coming to Pearl Street on Feb. 7 and features Vassar Clements, Clarence 'Gatemouth' Brown and John D. Loudermilk. The Mongrel Puppy will be at the Zone on Feb. 16 opening up for Salem 66, Jonathan Richman will be playing at the Iron Horse on February 11 and Afrika Bambaataa will make a return appearance here at UMass as headliner of a show on March 1 at the SUB.

To get tickets for the upcoming Grateful Dead shows it is advised you mail away soon. They are playing two open seating shows in Springfield as well as in Portland. For more information call 415-457-0225.

For this weekend: Robin Lane and the Chartbusters will be playing at the Blue Wall, ages 18 and over can enter. Also on Friday Robin's main competition Joan Jett is playing with Molly Hatchet at the Agora in Hartford. For a change of pace, Rory Block is playing at the Iron Horse on Friday night and jazz guitarists Kevin Eubanks and Stanley Jordan will play there on Sunday, Happy Groundhog Day.

★ UM vs. Penn State

"On paper, we're the favorite," Gerlufsen said. "But we don't play that up at all. We need to work hard, keep up the defensive intensity and run our offense."

"We're getting good shots, passing well and shooting well. I like to see our free throws improve, but in the clutch I think we'll hit them."

UMass has been shooting just 63 percent from the line and need to improve on this area when the A-10 leaders come to town, but against the Lions tonight, solid play should suffice.

minuteman mutterings; braun and Neysmith are among the league-leaders in rebounds. Russell is sixth in points, Neysmith is 12th. Smith leads in assists and Russell is third in steals.

Don't forget Fitzhugh Tarry, a red-shirted 6-8 forward from Buffalo when thinking of next year. UMass is also after Duane Chase, a 6-5 ¾ forward from Baltimore Southeast. The 24-hour Atlantic 10 hotline number is 1-800-524-0546. Julius Erving, who left UMass after three years, is pursuing a masters in business here in the University Without Walls program.

Minutemen go on a Lion safari

Need win over Penn State for .500, front line play the key -Gerlufsen

by PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team isn'tlacking any motives tonight against Penn State.

A victory over the Nittany Lions (7:30 p.m. at the Springfield Civic Center) will accomplish many things for the Minutemen-a 9-9 record, a victory before the home fans after winter break and most importantly a chance break from the pack of four schools tied at 4-1 in fourth place in the Atlantic 10 conference.

"It's been a while since a conference game this late in the season has been important," UM coach Ron Gerlufsen said. "This is a big game for us."

"We're still looking at this as a step toward being better than last season and going higher in the league. We'd like to be in the top half of the league, we know what we want to do."

The Minutemen have taken three-of-four games and are returning from a three-game road swing. They have to guard against complacency against the Lions (1-6 in the league and 5-10 overall) according to Gerlufsen.

"This league is balanced enough that the worst team can beat the best. We have to be careful against them. We can outplay them, it's a matter of doing it on the court."

The Lions are a tall team, going 6-10, 6-8 and 6-4 in the frontcourt. The Minutemen will counter with seniors Horace Neysmith (15.3 points per game and 8.5 rebounds) and Bobby Bruan (9.0 ppg and 9.5 rebounds) off the boards. Bruan had 17 boards against URI and 20 points.

The backcourt will see point-man Carl Smith (18.1 ppg and 78 assists) and Donald Russell (a team-high 16.8 ppg) looking to keep their balanced scoring with swingman Lorenzo Sutton (10.5 ppg) hoping to get over the flu that limited him to 14 minutes and two points against URI.

Tom Emerson will play a role against the Lions' height, possibly against former Western Mass Player-of-the-Year Carl Chrabascz, a transfer from Lehigh who is averaging six rebounds a game and a lot of playing time.

UMass's Carl Smith goes sideways against St. Joseph's in January action. Matt Ryan (21) looks on. The shot went.

UMass needs to stop Craig Collins (14.6 ppg and a conference-leading 93 percent free-throw percentage) to slow down the PSU offense.

"There's no one thing to do, just get at them and play our game," Gerlufsen said. "We have the talent to beat them at all positions."

The Lions lost three starters last season, during which they were swept by UMass, and second-year coach Bruce Parkill has 11 underclassmen on his 13 player roster.

Tonight's Ticket Info

There's little, if any, problem getting to the UMass-Penn State game tonight at the Springfield Civic Center.

The Ticket: There's two options, 1. Go to the Boyden Ticket office with an ID, 2. Get the ticket at the Civic Center.

The Bus Ride: There are three free buses leaving from Boyden at 6:15 p.m. tonight. No tickets, no problems, hop the bus and go to the game. The buses leave after the game, depending on the driver, approximately an hour after the game.

The Beer: It's Miller and it's cold. What else do you need? Enjoy the game.

UMass roundup

Big meets up for track, ski teams in first

The men's and women's track teams at the University of Massachusetts came through with a good effort at the Greater Boston Track Club's Invitational this past weekend at Harvard University.

For the men, Todd Johnson was fourth in the long jump at 21-4 3/4 and Ferdie Adoboe was fifth at 20-9 3/4.

Rawle Chrielow took sixth in the 440 with a 49.8. Steve Tolley was sixth in the 1,000 at 2:14.7.

The two mile relay team took fourth with the mile relay taking fifth.

For the women, Bridgette Booker had a 26.3 in the 200, Barbara Cullinan was third in the 400 with a 57.68, Diedre Doyle had a 10:31 3,000. The 4 x 200 team went 1:43.6.

The UMass ski teams, both the men and women, are in first place with the men leading Boston College and the women also topping the Eagles.

For the men, 26-25 leaders over BC in the Eastern Collegiate Ski Conference, senior Bob Faigel, Jonathon Segal, Dan Conway, Craig McCordic and Matt Luczkow have been scoring points. Sunday, Plymouth State took the giant slalom with UMass, behind Segall, taking second.

The women, led by senior captain Sue White, have also looked sharp. Kathy Smiley, Colleen Sweeney, Lisa Luczkow, Tricia Higgins, Susan Levy and Kara Mulwn have been the mainstays for coach Bill MacConnell.

The track teams have the "big" meets upcoming with the Princeton Relays and the Easterns. The skiiers will be at the Plymouth State tournament this weekend at Cannon Mountain, NH.

Sports Log

Just a few thoughts...

Hope everyone had an enjoyable winter break, whether it was basking in the sun at the South Seas or struggling through ComStu 121 for over two hours a day during the dreaded January session. I also would like to wish everyone the best of luck in the upcoming semester (If the Collegian won't hire me, maybe Hallmark will).

Some interesting developments in the month of January: San Fransisco won the Super Bowl as every other team has, through tough defense. Marino and Co. had a great year but were never really tested playing the likes of Buffalo, Indianapolis, and yes, the Patriots...

ABC's coverage was very conservative, very well done, but not very innovative. Somebody please tell me what that thing is ABC calls a scoring summary. It's plenty colorful but not really necessary. Now does the red stripes mean run or the black? The world may never know...What was the most intriguing was all the gambling involved. People were betting on from who would spike the ball the most to who would be the first to say "Hi Mom". One person actually bet $73,000 on the Dolphins to win back $70,000. This same person also said he didn't care about the money--he did it for the thrill of competition. (It should also be noted that this guy's parents dropped him on his head twelve times before the age of two.)

The Pro Bowl was a yawner despite all the great athletes there, which reaffirms the argument that baseball has the only real All-Star game. The fact that the two leagues don't meet during the regular season makes it that much more exciting...Basketball's All-Star game can also be exciting, especially with Larry "Last Shot" Bird and Michael Jordan, who may just walk off with the MVP.

date of the week dept.: has to go to baseball pitcher Dave Stewert, who got double his money when he paid for a transvestite prostitute. No, Alan Funt had nothing to do with it...Finally, you know wrestling has gone big when announcer Vince McMahon goes from David Letterman to Good Morning America in a matter of days.

No more need be said.

Protestors rallyinside Whitmore

By ANDREW M. PAVEN
Collegian Staff

The Whitmore Administration Building was besieged yesterday afternoon by about 200 students protesting the University's plan to eliminate the Campus Center Board of Governors.

Forty of those students occupied the hallway and stairs outside Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey's office for approximately 30 minutes, hearing speeches by student leaders and chanting "Save the BOG," and "We want DeNyse."

The rally was in response to an administrative proposal to eliminate the 32-member Board of Governors, which is made up entirely of students. The board, which oversees the administration of programming and activities in the Campus Center/Student Union complex, would be replaced by a 16-member Auxiliary Services Board, comprised of faculty, staff, alumni and students. The proposal was announced Dec. 26 by Vice Chancellor John L. DeNyse.

"The main issue is that student money is being played around with," said Student Government Association Treasurer John Mooradian, speaking through a bullhorn to the crowd. "We won't stand for this DeNysal of our Rights," he punned.

"The administration has to be sensitive to us and I think Jack DeNyse should be out here speaking to us," said Kevin Sweeney, president of University Democrats. "The only way we're going to take control of our campus is to show (the administration) that we care. I'm sure Jack DeNyse isn't going to forget us for a long time."

The occupation followed a rally outside the Student Union, attended by about 200 students. After listening to speeches, most of the 200, many of whom carried signs, marched to Whitmore chanting, "What do we want? Rights. When do we want them? Now."

STUDENTS PROTEST — Approximately 200 University of Massachusetts students participated in a rally yesterday, protesting the administration's proposed policy changes concerning the Campus Center Board of Governors.

Students carried signs that read, "Student Rights Count," "We Want Input," and "No Taxation Without Representation."

"They think it will streamline the board," said Fran Hegeler, treasurer of the BOG. The proposed plan, she said, "will make it easier to run the Campus Center the way they want to."

The administration said the proposed plan to consolidate the Campus Center trust funds would save students money by eliminating by $84 Campus Center fee students currently pay.

SGA co-presidnet Jim Keller said students would still pay about the same amount in the new Universal Resource Fee.

"Seventy-two dollars of the $84 fee goes to pay off bonds" that were sold to finance the construction of the Campus Center. Of the remaining $12, most of that will be proposed to be moved to the Student Activities Fee. "They'll just be calling it something different," said Keller.

"DeNyse said he doesn't think that there is a role for students in the management of the Campus Center," said Keller. "I think that role has been guaranteed by the Board of Trustees in 1972, when they approved the Whellman Document, a trustee policy on Unviersity governance. And I think they re-affirmed that policy when they approved the Mission Statement each year since," said Keller.

"I think this rally was really helpful," said BOG Chairperson Jane Donohue. "Administrators know there are certain student leaders and they might be under the impression that they're the only ones who care, but I think this shows them the student body is still concerned about their rights."

DeNyse, who was unavailable to students when they went to Whitmore, was approached at the Faculty Senate meeting yesterday by student leaders demanding an explanation of his plan. After an unsuccessful attempt by one senator to change the subject, DeNyse explained his actions to the Faculty Senate.

The (Auxiliary Services) advisory board will have some students on it, so there will be student input," he said. DeNyse denied last week's Collegian report that he said there was no place in the Campus Center for student management.

Tax cuts may affect UM budget

By LESLEY CLARK
Collegian Staff

For the first time since 1977, the University of Massachusetts may not receive an increase in its operating budget next year, Rep. James D. Collins (D-Amherst), told the faculty senate yesterday.

Collins, addressing the senate at its first meeting of the semester, said the present recommended budget for fiscal year 85 represents a decrease of .36 percent. In light of Gov. Michael S. Dukakis' "pre-election year yax cut," that decrease is "indefensible," Collins said.

"The money from the tax cut would be better spent on quality education," he said. "We're shortchanging our future."

The State Board of Regents of Higher Education had asked for a budget of $151.5 million, but recent recommendations from the governor dropped the proposed budget to $143.8 million.

"This cut comes at a time when the state is running a surplus," Collins said. "We're toying with a tax cut, and yet we're trimming education budgets. I feel it is totally unacceptable."

"We're toying with a tax cut, and yet we're trimming education budgets. I feel it is totally unacceptable."
— Rep. James Collins

Collins, a former co-chair of the House Education Committee, also outlined his plans for the modernization of the Massachusetts system of public education, which include providing stronger early childhood education, implementing statewide testing of basic skills before grade progression, establishing required classes for high school students and attaining resources to provide better teaching.

should have the best system in the United States, bar none," he said, adding that "our single most important resource is people."

Collins also discussed the involvement of the board of regents at UMass. He stressed the importance of viewing the board as a "coordinating board, not as directors," stating that "budget cutters can't be budget advocators."

He said he thinks the board is better suited to provide "on-going five-year plans regarding the state educational system, rather than participating on the campus level in daily planning."

Faculty senate passes course guidelines

By LESLEY CLARK
Collegian Staff

As a result of the 50 to 100 student complaints about unstructured courses received each year, the faculty senate yesterday ratified a proposal aimed at setting guidelines for course improvement.

The guidelines, approved unanimously, suggest possible ways for professors to minimize student confusion.

Gayle Wintjen, chairwoman of the Academic Affairs Committee, said the policy "will definitely alleviate misunderstanding...Right from the start students will know what is expected of them," she said.

The guidelines include:

- Availability of an up to date syllabus that includes:
  - outlined course objectives
  - special requirements for papers, grades or exams
  - attendance policy
  - grading criteria and the weight of each assignment
  - exam schedule and make-up policy
  - policy on academic honesty
  - office hours and telephone

Robert Kirk, a chemical engineering professor who introduced the proposal said its use two years ago by the Ombudsman had decreased the number of complaints issued, and "it would be beneficial to both students and professors if it were instituted campus-wide."

Vice-chancellor for Student Affairs, Dennis Madson, said the policy is "a step in the right direction," and added that he would like to see the development and circulation of more policies regarding academic matters.

The policy will be distributed to faculty at the beginning of each semester. It is not mandatory that professors follow it.

Come out groundhog Nick!

By DEBORAH BRUNO
Collegian Correspondent

Nick, a groundhog from Northfield, Mass., a town which is about 20 miles from Amherst, has not appeared on Feb. 2 in five years.

Since tomorrow is Groundhog Day, perhaps Northfield Nick will appear, but according to George Brosky, manager of the Northfield Mountain Recreation and Environmental Center, where Nick resides, it seems doubtful, because "we're too far north. He is not fortunate enough to have a heated den, like Punxsutawney Phil on Gobbler's Knob in Pennsylvania."

According to the Standard Dictionary of Folklore, Mythology and Legend, the groundhog is associated with Candlemas Day. On that day, Feb. 2, good or bad luck for sowing and planting in the coming season is determined by the weather. The groungohog plays an important role, because if he comes out of his hole and sees his shadow, he will go back in and stay six more weeks. If he doesn't see his shadow, the winter will continue and the result will be bad crops. If the day is cloudy and the groundhog does not see his shadow, it will mean an early spring and good crops.

Judge sets precedent in death case

BOSTON (AP) - In a precedent-setting case clarifying the law on double jeopardy, the state's highest court dismissed all criminal charges yesterday against a Boston man who was accused of beating his 20-month-old daughter to death.

Albert Berry, 38, of Dorchester, was charged with first-degree murder after his daughter, Shurasha Campbell, died on June 5, 1982.

The medical examiner said the girl died "from injuries caused by blows of 'great,' 'severe' force, and that such blows were 'consistent with karate or martial-arts-type blows'," the court reported.

His first trial, in Suffolk Superior Court, ended with a hung jury. When the state began to try him again, the high court stepped in and said Berry may not be tried again because he should have been found innocent in the first place.

The high court found that there was no concrete evidence linking Berry to the death, noting that both Berry and girl's mother were in their apartment on the day of death and that no witness testified about what actually happened.

"I think it's an extremely significant decision," Berry's lawyer, Michael Avery of Boston, said. "It's a marvelous decision from Mr. Berry's point of view, because the evidence was clear that he did not commit this murder."

Michael Traft, the assistant Suffolk County district attorney who handled the appeal, said he was surprised by the decision.

"The nub of the decision boils down to whetver you think there was sufficient evidence to convice Albert Berry in the trial," he said.

Traft said the court decision now gives all criminal defendants in Massachusetts an extra opportunity to "challange the sufficiency of the evidence" presented by prosecutors.

"As far as I'm aware, it's unprecedented. I'm not aware of any other states that have that rule."

He predicted that the decision would trigger extra appeals, making prosecutors' work more difficult.

Addressing that issue, Justice O'Connor wrote: "If our holding today increases judicial business, that result must be accepted. Courts exist to vindicate important rights."

Possible cure for AIDS discovered

NEWPORT BEACH, Calif. (AP) - Scientists have for the first time identified an antibody that inactivates the AIDS virus in laboratory experiments, a step toward development of an AIDS vaccine, a researcher said yesterday.

The discovery "does not prove you're going to be successful in finding a vaccine," said Dr. Robert Gallo of the National Cancer Institute, who headed one of two teams that announced discovery of the likely AIDS virus last April.

Asked if he believes an anti-AIDS vaccine can be developed, Gallo replied: 'I am hopeful...but it's really hard to say when."

Considerable research must be done to determine whether the antibody will destroy the virus in the human body as effectively as it destroys it in the laboratory.

Gallo described the discovery while talking to reporters attending a scientific conference in Newport Beach sponsored by the City of Hope National Medical Center. He said the discovery, made only recently, has not yet been reported in a scientific journal.

Reached in Boston, Hirsch confirmed the discovery, but declined further comment, except to say his findings soon will be published in a letter to the editor of a medical journal which he declined to identify and will be presented in April during an AIDS conference in Atlanta.

STANDING TRIAL — Twenty-five military men and a civilian, indicted for the assassination of Sen. Benigno Aquino, stand during arraignment yesterday. All the respondents pleaded "not guilty."

S.African activist may be released

Asks for formal statement

CAPE TOWN, South Africa (AP) - President P.W. Botha announced yesterday that the government would free black activist Nelson Mandela if he agreed to renounce violence. Mandela, South Africa's most prominent opponent of white minority rule, has served 20 years of a life sentence.

The offer to free Mandela and other imprisoned members of his African National Congress, the ANC, appeared to be a significant move away from prevailing white opinion. However, initial reaction by blacks suggested Mandela was not likely to accept it.

Ismail Ayob, Mandela's lawyer, said: "I can't imagine his looking at his own release to the exclusion of what he believes in. Mandela talks about the ANC while P.W. Botha only talks about the man, Mandela."

Ayob referred to Mandela's interview with a visiting British peer, Lord Bethell, published in London's Daily Mail on Sunday. In the unprecedented interview, Mandela said the government must legalize the African National Congress and negotiate with it before the organization abandons arms.

Mandela, 66, was sentenced to life in prison for planning sabotage against the government. He has said that blacks were forced to turn to violence because the ruling white minority ignored peaceful protests.

Even though he is allowed to communicate with only a small group of people, he remains the effective leader of South Africa's 22 million black majority and the 73-year-old African National Congress.

Shultz voices opinion on military use

Takes tough stance on Soviets

WASHINGTON (AP) - Secretary of State George P. Shultz said yesterday that the United States must never become to committed to nuclear arms negotiations that it is unwilling to respond to "outrageous...behavior" by the Soviet Union in Nicaragua or elsewhere.

"We must never let ourselves become so wedded to improving relations with the Soviets that we turn a blind eye to actions that undermine the very foundation of stable relations," Shultz said as he opened a broad review of American foreign policy for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

From Nicaragua to the Middle East to Eastern Europe, Shultz said the Soviet Union "can be counted on upon periodically to do something, somewhere that is abhorrent or inimical to our interests."

"Experience shows we cannot deter or undo Soviet geopolitical encroachments except by helping, one way or another, those resisting directly on the ground," the secretary said.

Shultz was the leadoff witness in a six-week examination by the committee of the direction of U.S. foreign policy under President Reagan.

"We should be willing to use all sources of national power short of direct U.S. military force," said Weinberger, who added: "We should never rule out the use of force if deterrence fails. There is a deterrent value in never saying never."

But he said there will never be political solutions unless it is understood that "agression is resisted and diplomacy is backed by strength."

Despite broad opposition in Congress, Shultz said the administration would continue to seek support for the "contra" rebels who are trying to overthrow the leftist Sandinista government in Nicaragua.

"If we abandon those seeking democracy, the extremists will gain and the forces of moderation and decency will be the victims," Shultz said. "Our nation's vital interests and moral responsibility require us to stand by our friends in their struggle for freedom."

"Acting directly and through Cuba," Shultz said, "the Soviet Union is abetting the establishment of a new communist dictatorship in Nicaragua."

The secretary said the United States must continue the strategic weapons buildup begun under Reagan, including construction of the MX missile, "to avoid undercutting our negotiators just as they begin the quest for real reductions in nuclear arms."

Catholic nuns want apology from Reagan staff or Regan

WASHINGTON(AP)— Treasury Secretary Donald Regan is unaware Roman Catholic nuns in New England want an apology for his comments about the way sisters manage hospitals, but he already has written a contrite letter to a Midwestern religious order, a spokesman said yesterday.

The leaders of 48 congregations of Roman Catholic nuns in New England demanded Regan, soon to become White House chief of staff, apologize for remarks quoted in a Jan. 7 Newsweek magazine article. "My heart cannot bleed for many hospitals hurt by limits on Medicare payments, even those run by Roman Catholic nuns. Their hearts are big, but their heads aren't screwed on tight. Most of them need new management," Regan was quoted as saying.

Roger Bolton, a spokesman for Regan, said he was unaware of the request from the New England nuns. But Bolton said Regan already has written to a St. Louis religious order, explaining that the comments in the news magazine "reflected neither what he said or meant."

"If somehow, in an unguarded moment in a totally private meeting, I could ever conceivably foster an environment where such a misinterpretation could take place, I apologize," Bolton quoted Regan as writing in the letter. Bolton declined to release the full text of the letter to the Daughters of Charity.

The Treasury Department spokesman said the quotes attributed to Regan came from a private meeting on federal health insurance programs, which a Newsweek reporter was allowed to attend.

Sister Kathleen Keating, chairwoman of the New England Region of the Leadership Conference of Women Religious, said the sisters, many of whom run hospitals, "voted unanimously to express their indignation to Mr. Regan."

"When you add up the larger congregations, there are at least 20,000 sisters in New England and they are all upset," she said in a telephone interview Thursday.

Students frustrated

Many SOM courses full

By LAURA KOESTER
Collegian Staff

Some students expressed anger and frustration over the problem of oversubscribed classes in the School of Management (SOM), a problem administrators say is due to lack of money and inadequate resources.

But the problem of overenrolled classes is not confined to SOM, according to Charlene Forgue, assistant to director of the scheduling office. "Every department has some oversubscribed courses," she said, citing Computer and Information Science, Engineering and Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration as other departments with crowding problems.

Harry Allen, dean of SOM, said "We've been on rigid enrollment control since 1976. We've been trying to get more money, but it's a supply/demand problem which is not unique to business. I have a great deal of sympathy for the administration."

The admissions problem is "bad if not worse" than last year, Nelson Pion, assistant dean of SOM and chief undergraduate adviser, said. "We have 3,200 applicants for 350 seats in freshman admissions and 350 internal applicants for 75 to 100 seats," Pion said. "We have an inadequate amount of faculty and budgetary resources."

Pion added that he does not know what steps are being taken to alleviate the problem.

Eric Berkowitz, chairman of the marketing department, said "The problem is that not enough dollars are coming from Boston. It's a very serious situation. Our program is very strong here, but we don't have adequate resources. It's not fair to the taxpayers. If you're accepted here, you should be able to take whatever major you want."

Beth Myers, a teaching assistant who works in the undergraduate counseling office, said the courses people are having problems getting into are accounting 221, 222, general business and finance 301, marketing 301, and management 301, which are all prerequisites for higher level classes. "All management classes are in high demand," she said.

"The problem is a budgetary one. If we had money for more positions, we could find people to fill them, but we have to pay what the market will sustain," Arthur Carlisle, chairman of the management department said.

Despite administrators' rationale for oversubscribed classes, there are still 19 departments outside of SOM with more than 2,000 students whose majors must take certain required classes in SOM. The departments that have contracts with SOM include Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration, Sports Management, Leisure Studies, and Fashion Marketing.

An employee of the Registrar's office who refused to be identified said, "The situation is very serious. Students are very frustrated. I've heard seniors talking who can't get into classes they need to graduate this spring. This problem needs to be known and addressed."

Maria Berlingen and Marta Figueron, both marketing majors on exchange from the University of Puerto Rico, said their graduation would be delayed by a semester or even a year because they could not get required classes such as Marketing 425 and Marketing Communications 422. "They only opened two sections of a class which so many people have to take. It's ridiculous."

Some students did not have any trouble getting into courses. Tom Chirokas, a transfer student, "never had a problem. I'm very satisfied with the business school here. I think the deans do a good job."

Mike Rabb and Alan Eisenberg said although they haven't had a problem, "There is a lot of trouble for underclassmen. There are too many students and not enough classes. I know a lot of seniors who are having problems," Eisenberg said.

SGA, officials amend constitution

By JOHN YONCE
Collegian Staff

A draft of the constitution of the Student Government Association has been decided upon by administrators and student representatives, Chris Sullivan, speaker of the undergraduate student senate said.

The document, which has not been revised for about 33 years, "defines the parameters and format by which the government shall function," Randy Donant, director of Student Activities said. Donant and Sullivan were members of a "constitution task force" of seven SGA members and five administrators formed last semester to resolve on-campus differences in the wording of the constitution.

An earlier draft of the document was approved last spring by the senate and sent to the administration for review before forwarding to the trustees, who have final approval.

But the draft was returned in November to the students with "about five pages of notes tacked onto it" from UMass Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey and General Counsel William Searson, SGA co-president Jim Keller said. The trustees would not approve the constitution until all conflicts between students and administrators are resolved, he said.

"We've gone over it literally section by section," Donant said.

Sullivan said the task force agreed on a section of the constitution which would give the senate "authority to set up agencies to participate in the regulation of buildings funded by student monies." Donant said that this section would guarantee student input and comments on the running of buildings like the Campus Center/Student Union complex, for which students pay a fee each semester.

Sullivan said that the section could have implications in the current debate over the dissolution of the Campus Center Board of Governors. The board would be eliminated as part of a plan that would consolidate the trust funds of the Campus Center, Conference Services and the University's dining commons.

Another section of the draft would allow the senate to continue to allocate the activities fees as it has for 37 years, with the trustees holding veto power, Sullivan said.

"Massachusetts general law gives the trustees authority to delegate responsibility for budgeting out the student activities fees," he said.

Donant said the task force had "appropriately skirted the issue" of final control of the fees. "Technically, the chancellor is charged with that responsibility," he said. "The trustees have that position (of final control), how they translate it is another issue."

A student bill of rights, outlining the rights of a student before a university judiciary board, will be included in the constitution, Sullivan said.

Searson had opposed inclusion of the bill because it is "confrontational and unnecessarily imports into university affairs substantial aspects of criminal due process," he wrote in his comments on the document.

The new version of the bill allows a "student advisor" who will be allowed to speak on behalf of the student in "certain instances," Sullivan said.

"Searson has his concerns, but we'll argue it out at the trustee's level," he said.

STRANDED FAMILY — Mary Albert and her two grandchildren, Philbert, 3, center, and Jamie, 7, were visited by a helicopter survey team Wednesday. They live in a hogan about 25 miles north of Window Rock, Arizona on the Navajo Indian Reservation and although low on food, the family was found to be in no danger, officials said.

April approval date sought for conduct code revisions

By JOHN YONCE
Collegian Staff

Student leaders and administrators at the University of Massachusetts have agreed on most points of the revised Code of Student Conduct and expect to have a draft to present to the Board of Trustees April 3, Dakin Ferris, former Student Government Association attorney general said.

The code of Student Conduct is a set of basic rules of student discipline and is included in the packet of information given to first-year and transfer students when they come to UMass.

The code has not been revised since about 1966, Dean of Students William F. Field said. It is being re-written to bring it up to date and in line with changes being made in residential judicial policies, academic honesty rules, and the revision of the SGA constitution.

Associate Dean of Students Robert N. Brooks said last November, "We hope to have a mutually approved draft by Dec.22," but meetings between students and the administration were delayed and the revision targeted for the end of (last) semester.

"I don't like to put deadlines on things," Field said last week. But, "Things are coming right along."

Field refused to discuss the details of the revision, but said "the students working on the revision can speak for all of us."

Two previous causes of disagreement between the administrators and students, the definition of harassment and whether or not to allow advocates to represent students before University judicial boards, have been settled, Ferris said.

"The trouble (with the harassment section) was not how it was written, but how it was implemented," he said. "We have documented cases in which it was used to prevent free speech."

"We're working on methods where implementation is more compatible with the intent of the language," Ferris said.

Ferris said the issue of student advocacy is "being worked out in constitution meetings."

"We've both agreed to use what is put in the student bill of rights in the SGA constitution," he said.

The student bill of rights will allow a "student adviser", but not a lawyer, who will be allowed to speak on behalf of the student in "certain instances" in the draft agreed upon as of Jan. 23 by the constitutional task force, which consists of seven students and five administrators, Sullivan said.

Details previously agreed upon include rules that will punish acts of harassment based on race, religion, sex and sexual preference. The new code will also prohibit accessing computer files to tamper with records or invade another person's privacy, and will have stricter rules on misuse of UMass ID cards.

Opinions revealed on campus safety

By JOHN VINCENT
Collegian Staff

Students feel safe on campus, don't report many crimes but avoid parking lots and footpaths at night for fear of assault according to the results of a survey recently conducted by the Student Affairs Research and Evaluation Office.

Police statistics agree with the opinions of students elicited in the survey that the campus is a safe place. Only 2,347 incidents of crime were reported, in 1983 with 1001 of those being serious or Class I crimes, on a campus with 25,838 enrolled 11,000 of which lived on campus.

Of the 242 students who responded to the telephone survey, 94.6 said they felt moderately or very safe on the UMass campus in general.

The Director of Security, Department of Public Safety at Umass, Gerald O'Neil said "I feel this campus is very safe." O'Neil said campus safety is increasing with the installation of five new emergency phones, and lights near Boyden Gymnasium and near the chancellor's house in Central residential area next semester.

"We need not only to improve by adding more lighting, but we also must improve our communication.

People have to want to report when an incident happens to them so we can respond timely," said O'Neil.

The survey showed that about two-thirds of the people who said they had property stolen or were threatened or harrassed did not report the crime to the police.

William Weitzer, director of SAREO said "I don't know why people don't report these crimes but it's significant that this happens. These reports help Public Safety get a measure of the rates of crime and the reporting of crime. It should help them plan strategies to induce reporting (of crimes)."

The UMass Police Department runs educational and crime preventive programs. Almost 70 percent of the respondents said they thought more of these programs would help reduce crime. The survey also showed that only 11.2 percent of those surveyed participated in the police programs last semester.

Weitzer said the difference between those who think educational programs would help and those who actually attend them "points to the fact that outreach efforts are needed. First students need to be aware of the programs, then they can use them."

One third of the students who responded to the survey said they adjust where they walk on campus to avoid footpaths and parking lots. However, most said they feel safer near the residence halls, the library and the academic buildings. The largest amount of crimes reported happened, 810, in the campus area between North Pleasant Street and Massachusetts Avenue, including most of the academic buildings on campus from Boyden Gym to the Graduate Research Towers.

$5 million contract hasn't cleaned any air yet

Deteriorated facility is part of the problem

Second of two articles.

By IAN POLUMBAUM
Collegian Staff

Logistical and safety problems partially responsible for the current delays in getting the University of Massachusetts power plant's $5 million exhaust filter apparatus on line owe much to the plant's dilapidated condition, Physical Plant officials say.

The "baghouse" is designed to bring UMass into compliance with the Clean Air Act of 1970- of which it has been cited as a violator since 1977- by filtering coal dust out of the smoke from the steam plant's three main boilers.

Physical Plant Director Roger Cherewatti said yesterday that because four smaller backup boilers are in poor repair, any wintertime baghouse testing must be done while all three main boilers continue to burn coal at 2400 degrees Fahrenheit and heat the campus.

Aiming to accomplish this safely, the Physical Plant plans to use a series of dampers in the exhaust duct serving the main boilers to divert the 500-degree gases through the baghouse one or two boilers at a time. (See diagram.)

"With our deteriorated heating plant, we don't have the flexibility of substituting boilers," Cherewatti said. "But we're not going to jeopardize our personnel (by testing the baghouse hastily) or heat for the campus (by shutting down and risking frozen pipes in UMass buildings)."

Physical Plant Operations Supervisor, Peter Wozniak, earlier this week said, "You want to have clean air... we want to do it so it's safe." He pointed out several Boston Chimney Co. employees perched on the exhaust duct near the power plant's roof as they worked on installing the dampers. "If something goes wrong, it could kill these guys or our people down below."

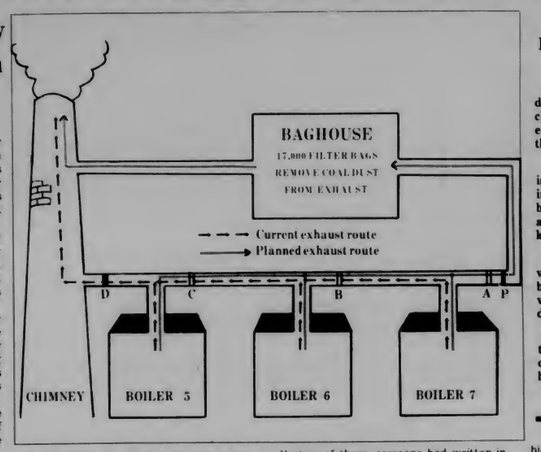
Wozniak gestured toward the four 36-year-old Westinghouse backup boilers and said, "They're slowly becoming obsolete. With the economics of rebuilding them, they should just be removed."

The boilers in question were dirty and rusted, their pipe insulation falling apart. On two of them, someone had written in chalk, "No coal." Wozniak said that every time they are fired up, such as when one of the main boilers is shut down for yearly inspection and cleaning, more repairs are needed and it is increasingly difficult to find parts.

He said the main boilers are in "great shape, considering their age," 25 to 26 years, and would last another seven to eight years if left in their present condition.

Since Thomas J. O'Connor, Inc., a Canton-based general contractor, won the bidding for the baghouse construction in 1983, there have also been delays in deliveries of equipment and instructions, as well as "scheduling problems," Cherewatti said, with O'Connor and several subcontractors.

Wozniak attributed these problems to "Murphy's Law" (whatever can go wrong, will.) He added, "It certainly doesn't help" that under Massachusetts law a state project must be awarded to the contractor who offers to do the job most inexpensively. "They're certainly concerned with reducing overhead costs."



PLANNED PROCEDURE FOR TESTING BAGHOUSE

Workers are installing a series of dampers — which can be opened and closed with electric hoists — along the exhaust duct above the power plant's three main coal-fired boilers.

When the dampers are functional, existing plug (P) will be removed, enabling the Physical Plant to test the baghouse with exhaust from boiler 7 alone by opening damper (A) while keeping (B) closed.

Opening damper (B) and closing (C) will divert the exhaust from both boilers 6 and 7 through the baghouse, while boiler 5's smoke continues to go directly to the smokestack.

When all three dampers are open and the old duct to the smokestack sealed off at point D, exhaust from all three boilers will be filtered.

Book on abortion published by Hampshire professors for class use

By LAURA KOESTER
Collegian Staff

Abortion: Moral and Legal Perspectives, is a new anthology of essays on abortion edited by Hampshire College professor Jay Garfield and former professor Patricia Hennessy and published by the University of Massachusetts Press. The book was designed as a resource for those who want to teach on the subject on college campuses, according to co-editor Patricia Hennessy.

"Professor Garfield and I were teaching a course at Hampshire College on affirmative action. We found we could talk about particular cases, but not the underlying moral, legal and ethical questions," Hennessy said.

Garfield is entering his fifth year as assistant professor of philosophy at Hampshire.

"We did a class on affirmative action and then did the course on abortion the next year using the same format. We found that all the material on abortion was ten years old," he said.

"The important thing about the anthology and about the course is the way the interaction between law and philosophy sheds light on the issue. The book looks at both sides of the issue in the context of the current debate," he said.

The anothology contains articles on topics such as Roe vs. Wade, arguments on what is a human life, attempts to legislate standards of morality, and the judicial status of the fetus.

Nine of twelve essays in the anthology were papers delivered at a conference marking the tenth anniversary of the famous Roe vs. Wade decision legalizing abortion, held at Hampshire in January of 1983.

"A year and a half before the conference, Jay and I contacted scholars and activists in our fields (of law and philosophy) and asked them to prepare papers for the conference," Hennessy said.

Hennessy was the first director of the Civil Liberties and Public Policy Program at Hampshire. She is now an associate at the law firm of Kaye, Scholer, Fierman, Hays, and Handler in New York City, where she worked before coming to Hampshire in 1981.

In 1977 Hennessy worked on the famous case of McRae v. Harris, the ACLU's challenge to federal restrictions on medicaid funding for abortion.

Peeping Tom, fire, wallet theft reported

Two female students reported that they saw a man looking at them while they were in the shower Wednesday, University of Massachusetts Police said.

Police said they responded to the call on the eighth floor bathroom of John Quincy Adams dormitory at 3:07 p.m. The incident is under investigation.

In other police action:

A trash barrel fire in the west stairwell of the Campus Center was reported at 12:50 a.m. yesterday. Police said the fire was already extinguished when a security guard found it. Cigarette butts may have ignited the fire.

An Amherst man's wallet was reportedly stolen from Boyden Gymnasium while the owner was playing basketball Wednesday. It was taken from a jacket placed on the sidelines in a period of about one hour.

Engineering gets $350,000 grant

By JEANETTE DeFORGE
Collegian Staff

The General Electric Company donated a $350,000 grant to the microwave program of the electrical engineering department of the University of Massachusetts yesterday.

A $97,000 check was given to Vice Chancellor of Research and Planning Samuel Conti, at a luncheon given in the Campus Center in honor of the General Electric Company.

The program will receive $103,000 in July and will be paid an annual sum of $150,000 annually for five years beginning in 1985, said Robert McIntosh, the area coordinator of microwave electronics at UMass.

One of the provisions in the grant allows G.E. to send between five and seven employees to UMass to begin their masters degree studies in microwave engineering in 1985.

McIntosh said $200,000 of the grant will we used for research in the program. The remaining $150,000 will be divided between fellowships and the purchasing of new equipment.

"This is the strongest program (in microwave technology) in the country," said Walter Butler, manager of the electronics laboratory in Syracuse, N.Y. The program at UMass is a graduate program and there are 200 people in the department including eight professors. "There are also six to ten undergraduates that work with us in the summer," said McIntosh.

"There has been an active partnership between the company (G.E.) and the University," said Lois McCabe of the development and alumni relations office. General Electric has given many grants to the engineering department, she said.

The G.E. company is planning to give a grant of $250,000 to the doctorate department of the electrical and computer engineering department in Sept. 85, she said.

Asked why he could not confront the student protestors, DeNyse said, "I just had a previous commitment."

The vice chancellor said "I believe they (his fellow vice chancellors) are in support of the plan," but added they have never told him this.

Executive Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs and Provost Richard O'Brien said he feels "it is important to separate the two aspects of this plan, the issue of student input and the issue of cost management."

He said, "What is not being thought through is the implications for student input. But the chancellor has set a at them."

Other administraiton employees in Whitmore today were unfazed by the student invasion. All the doors to offices on the third floor were locked but reporters gained easy entry.

"It's exciting, but we're too busy to bother with this," one secretary said. Most of the non-administrative personnel in Whitmore went about their business normally, as officials of the Department of Public Safety roamed the halls.

"There are no problems here, they're all being quite cooperative," UMass Police Chief Robert G. Joyce said.

Commuter Area Government presents progressive films

Each semester the Commuter Area Government presents the Progressive Film Series. This collection of films, from and about many different parts of the world, is the longest running film series of its kind in this area. All films are shown on the UMass campus and are free to the public.

February 21
"Black Shadows on a Silver Screen"
Campus Center Rm. 101 at 3 p.m. & 8 p.m.
• A history of the Black film companies that sprung up in reaction to Hollywood stereotypes, overcoming obstacles to get their movies made and shown. Early film footage includes performances by Paul Robeson, Cab Calloway and Duke Ellington.

February 28
"No Maps on My Taps"
Campus Center Rm. 163 at 3 p.m. & 8 p.m.
• This film offers an unique insight into jazz tap dancing as a neglected Black American art form. The spirit of tap in its heyday is shown in rare photos and Hollywood film clips from the 1930s.

March 7
"A Veiled Revolution" and "Women in Nicaragua: The Second Revolution"
Campus Center Rm. 163 at 3 p.m. & 8 p.m.
• A Veiled Revolution is a documentary examining the womens movement in Egypt. Women in Nicaragua explores the efforts of women to gain equality and combat machoism as part of Nicaragua's "second revolution."

March 14
"A Free Woman"
Campus Center Rm. 163 at 3 p.m. & 8 p.m.
• This film has been called the first masterpiece of the women's liberation movement. Directed by Volker Schlondorff, it tells of a recently divorced, thirtyish woman who is now "free".

March 28
"Broken Treaty on Battle Mountain"
Campus Center Rm. 101 at 3 p.m. & 8 p.m.
• This award-winning documentary has been widely acclaimed as the most important and emotionally powerful film on the American Indian. Narrated by Robert Redford, the film shows the struggle of the Western Shoshone Indians to regain 24 million acres of land stolen from them by the U.S. government.

April 3
3 Martin Luther King films
Campus Center Rm. 163 at 3 p.m. & 8 p.m.
• Films being shown are "I Have a Dream...The Life of Martin Luther King", "Martin Luther King: Doubts and Certainty", and "Martin Luther King, Jr.: From Montgomery to Memphis". These three films document the life of America's greatest civil rights leader.

April 11
"Avenue of the Americas"
Campus Center Rm. 174 at 3 p.m. & 8 p.m.
• A documentary about U.S. involvement in Chile. This film focuses on the nature and extent of U.S. government and corporate complicity in the "destabilization" campaign and the September 11th, 1973 coup.

April 18
"The White Rose"
Campus Center Rm. 101 at 3 p.m. & 8 p.m.
• The highly acclaimed film telling about the German resistance against Nazism during World War II. The White Rose protest was organized by a handful of brave German university students who could not be silent in the face of the Holocaust.

April 24
"Sugar Cane Alley"
S.U. Ballroom at 3 p.m. and Thompson Hall Aud. at 7 p.m. & 9 p.m.
• Sugar Cane Alley was one of the best films of 1984. It tells, not only of the life of a young boy, but also of an entire way of life in a Carribean country. Set in the 1830s, this film is a deceptively gentle, almost polite tale about growing up Black, poor, proud and fiercely ambitious on the French West Indian island of Martinique.

ARTS

CINEMASCOOP
by Count Ramin Zahed

Yes, this column is back for another semester of nonsense about vain movie stars and the variety of films available in the area. First allow me to lighten up your drop/add weekend by giving you some exciting news about the legendary Pia Zadora. We last saw Mrs. Zadora when her wealthy husband bought her a Grammy nomination for best female vocalist. If that wasn't enough, she has also prepared a film ready for a shameful release this year called When the Ram Begins to Fall. Pia is the star of this picture which is an account of the adventures of six-inch aliens which grow after being removed from refrigeration. Frankly, Mrs. Zadora and her loving husband are pushing it a bit too far this time!!

During the break, I finally got the chance to see Paris, Texas. I simply have to say this: Nastassja Kinski is the best, most beautiful, most versatile actress alive. The film's first half was very good, but it was evident that Nastassja was the main attraction. Her latest film Maria's Lovers has not been released in the Amherst area. Rush to the theatre as soon as it arrives and treat yourself to the talents of the Ingrid Bergman of the eighties.

Disneyland is celebrating its thirtieth anniversary this year. Look out for three new releases from the Disney Studios. One is the hyped Return to Oz, the second is the major full length animated The Black Cauldron and the third is a comedy about a couple who discover a baby dinosaur, appropriately titled Baby. It should be a great year for all us Mickey fans.

Meet George Jetson again on television this year. Hanna Barbra is now producing yet 42 new episodes of one of television's favorite shows. There is even talk of a motion picture about the space age family, possibly starring Goldie Hawn and Chevey Chase. Now, that's good news.

Looks like Woody Allen's latest film The Purple Rose of Cairo will be released nationwide very soon. Woody's zany tale is about a housewife (Mia Farrow) who is infatuated with a matinee idol. The trailers look very funny.

Pick of the Week: Judy Davis and James Fox star in David Lean's classic adaptation of "A Passage to India", playing at the Hampshire Mall Cinema.

Weekend Winners: If you still have not seen either The Killing Fields or Passage to India, do rush to Hampshire Mall Cinema. These very well-crafted films are two of the best of 1984, and are bound to sweep the Academy Awards. While the latter is more witty and literary, and the former is harsher in tone, they are both simply beautiful to look at.

If you are in a lighter state of mind, check out The Brother from Another Planet at the Pleasant Street Theatre in Northampton.

Local Loser: How would you like to spend five precious dollars on a movie, probably low-budget, about aerobic dancing with Dwight Twilley (who?) and the Sparks providing the music? Pia Zadora would probably love it, but I wouldn't even recommend Heavenly Bodies (the new movie at the Mt. Farm Cinemas) to Victoria Principal.

Killer Question: Here down at the Collegian Arts desk rests a priceless collector's item press package along with glossy stills from the upcoming Heaven Help Us, the latest teenage comedy set in a Catholic school in Brooklyn. Donald Sutherland stars as a stern and saintly teacher. The first person who writes down the name of the Jetsons' maid (with the time and date on the answer) and drops it in my Collegian mailbox will win the package. By the way, look for the Cinemascoop Academy Awards Contest with super prizes in the near future.

Tickets are moving fast for Marcel Marceau's annual UMass Fine Arts Center Show, coming up on Saturday, February 9. To avoid disappointment, get yours soon from the FAC box office (545-2511).

Buying into the American dream of "success"

Real World 101: What College Never Taught You About Success
by James Calano and Jeff Salzman
Warner Books, $7.95, 231 pages

By RENEE BACHER
Collegian Staff

James Calano and Jeff Salzman were two ordinary college students who had big dreams for success and transformed what appeared to be delusions of gradeur into reality.

Calano at age 22 and Salzman at 25 both become presidents of their own companies fresh out of college. Together they founded a management training firm, and a publising company. Individually Calano is president of a direct marketing firm, and Salzman is president of an advertising agency.

What is their formula for success? Apparently it was not the prestige of attending Ivy League universities and neither man inherited a family fortune. Calano's and Salzman's book, Real World 101 (What College Never Taught You About Success) is a self-help book for college students on the art of acquiring street smarts.

I must add that although the authors appear to have completed the transition from the ivory tower to the rat race smoothly, their book is a glib account. Both men attribute a good portion of their business success to a quality they term "kick-ass confidence." While this quality may go over big during job interviews, it makes for an obnoxious writing style. For 226 pages, Calano and Salzman toot their own horns at blaring decibles.

In addition, I took issue with the way the authors defined success. "I've got the money, the dream home, the cars, the clothes, and the 'executive toys,' and when I think about it, I realize that I'm well on my way to what has been hyped as the Great American Dream," says one of the authors.

Apparently, neither Salzman nor Calano is familiar with Edward Albee's play The American Dream, which is infinitely less optimistic in its portrayal of such mentality. Yes, many of us will be graduating shortly and may wind up selling out to that awfully wretched system, but PLEASE, let's not be so cheerful about it! These men have not humility.

Okay, so the reader may or may not get over this nuance. If the reader does hold back from hurling Real World 101 madly into the nearest trash can, there are some helpful ideas and insights from which to benefit. One such insight is that college isn't really what people expect it to be. The authors say that the professors are generally lousy, inflated grades are producing sinking standards, and the emphasis is on facts, not skills. "It's the big inside joke: the only people who still have a high regard for college are the ones who didn't get to go," say the authors.

Many of us will be finding out that a college degree alone will not necessarily pay the rent let alone afford us luxuries. Here is where Calano and Salzman pull through for those rats interested in running the race.

Enter: ambition. So you want to lead some sort of fancy-schmancy upper middle class lifestyle? Well first, start dreaming. Calano and Salzman recommend "The Twenty-Year Fantasy Session" to help one identify personal goals. From there on, things get a little more concrete. For instance internships are suggested and there is advice on where to look for good connections within your field, and on how to write a resume.

Real World 101 is a quick lesson in making oneself a marketable commodity. It's an ambitious attempt, but there's a lot I don't trust about the characters who wrote this book. For instance, if their secrets are so valuable, why are they giving them all away?

OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

A month of history

Today marks the beginning of Black History Month, a time for special appreciation of the achievements of black men and women and their contributions to American society.

This event was initiated as Black History Week in 1926 by Dr. Carter G. Woodson, director of the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History, who strove to acknowledge the black person "as a participant, rather than a lay figure in history." In 1972, it was expanded to include the entire month of February, and is now celebrated in communities and on campuses across the nation.

At the University of Massachusetts, Black History Month's 1985 theme is "The Struggle for Freedom: The Past, Present and Future." As the title implies, this month is not only an opportunity to celebrate the past accomplishments and advancements of people of color, but a time for all of us — of all races — to remind ourselves that the struggle for civil rights is far from over.

We urge everyone to participate in Black History Month's lectures, exhibits, workshops, and music and drama performances, to expose themselves to black history and culture while recognizing that there is much to be done to eliminate discrimination from our consciousness.

Thoughts on the new year

Rob Skelton

Welcome, or, many happy returns. If you've made it here in one piece, you're doing well.

I spent a low-key four weeks on the safe streets of Northampton. Actually, I stayed in a comfortable (albeit drafty) apartment, and become frustrated only when thinking of those who did live on the streets. When I read a Boston Globe report on a man who was spending his 15th winter on an empty lot near Boston, I passed him off as having brain damage. In New York City, where the evaluation of two psychiatrists is needed before authorites can pull someone off the street, Mayor Koch said, "I don't care," and announced that all the homeless would be "rescued" at precisely five degrees below zero.

Lucky as we are to live in America and enjoy certain freedoms, there are some who choose to be different — to live unconventionally, dress differently and conflict ideologically with the norms. An artist I ran into recently was in despair. Inauguration festivities approaching, his dissatisfaction with the way things are going in this country led him to decide to go to Cuba, and then Nicaragua. His brother had just left for a protest in Washington, D.C. A question to be raised here is: Could such action stemming from dissatisfaction be tolerated in Havana or Moscow? I think not.

Another local delegation represented in the Capitol this month, the UMass Marching Band, was slightly disappointed to play only three out of four scheduled dates on the tour. The biggie to be performed for the President never happened, and perhaps it's just as well. A "Bedtime for Bonzo" cap worn by one un-named tuba player might have triggered security from the floor to the ozone layer. Actually, surfacing stories reminiscent of Queen Elizabeth's bedside visit from a stranger, but this time in the White House, will probably be cause for further the revamping of such security, and that tuba player maybe missed his one chance for fame. Maybe not.

Now we're back to the UMass grind: endless lines and jerking through the not-so-smooth UMass machine. A slimy move by a UMass administrator has caused a certain uproar, and for good reason. Just as formerly the Textbook Annex monopolized trade in college books, the men at the top now wish to cut student participation in the student-paid-for Campus Center complex. This proves that it is not enough to sit through any situation unaware of the proceedings and hope to receive what should be yours. No way. It has to be fought for.

And so it will be on campus this year. A well-known activist has targeted the ROTC program as one to be kicked off campus. The National Security Agency, which will be recruiting on campus soon, is sure to be a target of pickets and more.

There is more fear in the air recently, it seems. We get older and these issues pester and persist. Still, solutions seem distant; we become more educated yet the answers are tied up. We get bolder maybe, and things will start happening. Who knows? Anyway, take this as an introduction, and have a lively semester.

In search of substance

Rusty Denton

The 12th anniversary of the Supreme Court decision legalizing abortion was January 22. Some celebrated it out of rebellion, some out of ignorance, but for many it was a time of intense grief. Since the Roe v. Wade case in 1973, some 15 million babies have been aborted — more than all the American dead from every war since the Mayflower. Abortion has been called the American holocaust.

The Roe decision was an expensive one, in more ways than one. It was authored by Justice Blackmun and defined new depths of incompetence in interpreting the law. No less august a body than the Senate Judiciary Committee has censured the decision. The committee issued a report in 1982 after leading constitutional scholars had carefully scrutinized the decision. Their criticisms had three themes.

The first theme had to do with the constitutional basis of Roe. The many sources cited by the Court were almost entirely irrelevant to the constitutional inquiry, according to the report, and not one word was said about the relevant history and intention of the Fourteenth Amendment, upon which the decision was based. Legislators who ratified the Fourteenth Amendment also passed anti-abortion laws at both the federal and state level, yet the Court inferred from the due process clause of the amendment a shadowy, undefined right to privacy broad enough to encompass abortion. Lawyers of all stripes agree that the Constitution does not confer an unrestricted right to privacy.

It is ironic that the Fourteenth Amendment was cited by the Court. The amendment was passed in 1868 to reverse the effects of the Dred Scott decision, in which it was asserted that blacks were not legally persons, but property. The Court has used that very amendment to assert that the unborn are also not legally persons, but property. In going on to define a "right to abortion," the Court has been accused by the Judiciary Committee of exercising considerable imagination in interpreting the law.

In fact, the Court's opinion has been attributed to naked political preference and political activism on the part of its members. The Court acknowledged that the law allows the unborn to acquire rights, sue for damages, inherit property, and yet the Court refused to protect their citizenship, reversing strong legal tradition and effectively passing legislation in all 50 states. Where abortion is concerned, the Court has continued to ignore the states' right to outlaw constitutionally protected activities where the states' interests are involved. In other words, a state can outlaw deer hunting, which is a constitutionally protected right of individuals, but it can't outlaw abortion, even though a state may consider the fetus to be a citizen.

Clearly, rights have not only been created, but also abridged at the highest level. Either a new amendment or a reversal of the decision is necessary to repeal the effects of Roe v. Wade. It's expensive to have a Supreme Court that creates law out of thin air.

Rusty Denton is a Collegian columnist.

BLACK AFFAIRS

Why Black History Month is important

By KIMBERLY BURGE
and YADIRA BETANCES
Collegian Staff

We had a hard time writing this column. Why? Because we did not know enough about Black history. We wanted to write about the accomplishments of Black people, but Black history was never taught in our high schools.

This depresses and angers us a great deal because we feel that as people of color, we should know about all the great people of our race and yet the only thing that we know is that Blacks were slaves and that Martin Luther King led the fight for Civil Rights for Black people.

Why shouldn't we learn about such great figures as Nat Turner, Crispus Attucks, Charles Drew, Harriet Tubman, Mary McCleod Bethune, and Shirley Chisholm?

We found ourselves having a hard time coming up with just these few names and their achievements for the simple reason that Black History was denied to us in our secondary education. In fact, it is not even included in many of the history textbooks that are used by high school students.

We wish we could tell you more about the achievements that Blacks have made in science, education, and medicine.

Unfortunately, we can't. Why? Because the American educational system ignores the contributions that Blacks have made to the American culture.

In most high school history books, the contributions of Black Americans are given one or two paragraphs. Sometimes they are not even mentioned at all!

It is sad that some people feel that the contributions that Blacks have made to society are unworthy of recognition.

This is why Black History Month is so important. It gives everyone a chance to learn that Black people were more than just slaves and that they have contributed a great deal to the American society in music, education, politics and literature.

Yes! Our minds are free to celebrate the struggle for freedom. Black History month schedule of events listed on page 20.

The emergence of Afro American studies departments in colleges and universities across the country have given Blacks the opportunity to learn about the rich and vastful history that has attempted to make America a real democracy.

It also has shown that American history does not start and finish with George Washington. This is what Black History tries to acknowledge.

And this is why Black History Month is so important.

Events to bare new worlds

By CHRISTOPHER ALLEN
Collegian Correspondent

A six children's workshops and fair will be presented tomorrow from 2 to 6 p.m. in the Mwangi Cultural Center, Lilly Hall at Smith College.

The event is sponsored by Smith College in conjunction with the Dean of College Office and it's an extension of the regular children's fair which is held every Saturday from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m.

The fair will feature displays of children's literature and creative work. A panel discussion, films and African and African-American foods will also be featured in the day's activities.

The six workshops will be on Appreciating Math and Science, The World of Computers, Developing Pictures, Learning About Africa, Puppetry, and Children's Literature and Storytelling.

Alice Smith, assistant to the Dean for Minority Affairs said, "The children's fair has several aims such as to give African and African American children the opportunity to learn from each other in a comfortable group setting, to encourage children to learn more about their heritage and the world around them," she said. In addition, it will support the creative talents of children, and provide a supportive atmosphere for parents and others interested in the development of children.

There will be a clothing exchange which will offer second-hand clothing at minimal prices. Proceeds will be donated to families in need. People wishing to donate clothing to the exchange may contact the Office of Minority Affairs at 584-2700, ext. 4946.

Smith said approximately fifty area children have registered for the workshop. "The response has been quite good," Smith said.

The African and African-American children's fair is the first in a series of fairs planned by the Smith College of Minority Affairs. The next two fairs will focus on Asian and Asian American children, and Hispanic children.

Political ramification of Africa's famine explored

By JONINA ABRON

CURTIS LAWRENCE
Special to Black Affairs

Many times in recent months, around suppertime, millions of Americans tuned in the television evening news and saw starving children in Ethiopia.

And while we watched the malnourished faces of these children, moving many of us to make charitable contributions to relief agencies, the news commentators frequently ignored the political dimensions of the famine.

Many people believe there is famine in Africa because it has too many people. But, in fact, the continent has long been considered to be underpopulated.

Underpopulation, partly the result of the slave trade and colonialism, is often credited with slowing Africa's economic development. It is estimated that 50 million people died as a result of the slave trade alone. With this in mind, it is easy to see that overpopulation is not the cause of the famine.

On television we have seen pictures of the growing Sahara desert, encroaching upon more and more arable land. The Sahara is growing, and there is drought throughout much of Africa. However, many nations have suffered ecological disasters without massive starvation, including the United States.

The point is that drought, although important, is not a sufficient explanation of why people are dying of starvation.

In Ethiopia the government has pursued a policy of neglecting the needs of family farms while devoting the lion's share of its agricultural support to state farms. But it is the family farms who produce over 90 percent of the food grown in Ethiopia. Family farms are of particular importance to the rural population's ability to produce and acquire food.

The state farms, producing less than 10 percent of the agricultural output, have received over 85 percent of agricultural credit and over 60 percent of total government spending on agriculture. The output of the state farms has gone primarily to feeding the urban population.

The government of Ethiopia is, therefore, directly contributing to the erosion of family farming and the rural population's problems in producing and acquiring food.

But starvation is not limited to Ethiopia. At least nine countries in southern Africa — Mozambique, Angola, Swaziland, Lesotho, Botswana, Zambia, Zimbabwe, Malawi, and Tanzania — have also been hard hit by famine. South Africa has also been affected by the drought. Unlike its poorer neighbors, however, South Africa can afford to import food to make up for the shortfall in production.

In South Africa, a nation wealthy in natural resources, 136 children die needlessly each day — an estimated 50,000 people every year — from malnutrition and starvation. People die in South Africa in the midst of abundance, not because of too little food or too many people, but because of the official government policy of apartheid.

The South African government has also contributed to the famine in neighboring countries by destabilization policies designed to keep these countries economically underdeveloped and dependent.

For instance, in Mozambique, where the largely unpublicized famine killed an estimated 100,000 people in 1983, relief efforts have been hampered by sabotage from South African-financed rebels. The rebels have destroyed crops, railway lines, villages, roads, and displaced thousands of poor family farmers.

Mozambique's grain stocks from the 1983 harvest are running out and food relief is arriving at less than half the 1983 rate. South African supported sabotage is spreading to more and more of the Mozambican countryside hampering efforts to produce and transport food.

In addition, the Mozambican government has made the same errors as the Ethiopian government in relying on state farms while largely neglecting family farms. The result of these political actions can only be more suffering and more children.

In the United States, our government's foreign policy is an additional contributing factor to the famine. U.S.-based transnational agribusiness corporations and local elites in the less developed nations are increasing their control of the most fertile land in Africa, Asia, and Latin America.

The transnationals operate large-scale farms with little or no local input into the use of land. The crops are almost always destined for export rather than for local use.

It is no secret that our government has pursued a foreign policy supportive of those nations where the freedom of transnational corporations is least interfered with, even when this corporate freedom comes at the expense of the freedom of local populations.

It is also no secret that the allocation of U.S. foreign aid is often used to help prop up unpopular regimes in nations where poverty and hunger are common.

So what can we do to change the conditions which make famine possible? In nations, such as Ethiopia, which have allied themselves with the Soviet Union we can have minimal effect upon government policies shaping the control over food production and distribution. In southern Africa, and in many other parts of the world, where U.S. influence is important, we can have major impact.

Cocktail waitress wins 'hot pants' suit

AP Laserphoto

Cocktail waitress Monique Brand returns to work at a lounge after winning back her job. A federal judge ruled that she had a right to wear slacks, despite her employer's order that she wear hot pants.

TEWKSBURY (AP) Cocktail waitress Monique Brand says she never meant to get all mixed up with "women's lib," but when she became the target of groping, leering customers because of an order to wear hot pants, she went to court.

Now, after winning her right to wear slacks, she says she is beginning to envision a wider impact for her efforts.

"It's a victory not only for us, but for all women put in the same predicament," Brand said. "I just hope it makes a difference more than just in Tewksbury. I hope it makes all women realize they don't have to be subjected to this.

"The funny thing is that I never was involved in anything, let alone women's lib," she added. "But I knew it was just wrong."

Brand, 27, and other waitresses at the Holiday Inn in this city 30 miles north of Boston, filed a suit against the motel in April, 1983, charging that they had been subjected to sexual harassment because of their revealing uniforms.

Shortly after the suit was filed, a federal judge issued a restraining order temporarily ending the motel's order that waitresses wear brown "short shorts" with inseams no longer than an inch.

The waitresses and the motel reached and out-of-court settlement Jan. 15 that was negotiated and approved by the Boston office of the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Under the settlement, waitresses can wear hot pants or long slacks, and six of the waitresses involved in the original suit will receive small, undisclosed sums of money. Of them, Brand is the only one still working at the motel lounge.

"We never meant to make money from it," Brand said in a recent interview. "We didn't get into it for that. It was just that it wasn't right.

If we didn't do it, there would still be other women who would have to go through it, like I did."

Real estate companies indicted for racial bias

MILTON, Mass. (AP) - Following a seven-month undercover investigation, a state agency has charged eight real estate companies with discriminating against minorities seeking housing in this nearly all-white Boston suburb.

Roger MacLeod, of the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination, said yesterday that the real estate companies, as well as 21 real estate agents, have been charged with violating state and federal fair housing laws.

"You have to realize the fair housing laws are recent, and you are turning around a 300-year history," he said. "That's part of our obligation and that's what we're doing."

MacLeod said the MCAD decided to investigate housing practices in Milton after they received complaints from several residents. Only 430, or 1.6 percent of Milton's 26,000 residents are black.

Many Mass residents found guilty on taxes

BOSTON (AP) Several corporations and nine Massachusetts residents, among them a tax specialist, have denied charges they practiced alleged tax fraud or evasion worth more than $250,000.

Following work by the Department of Revenue's criminal investigation bureau, the cases were brought by the state attorney general's office, which announced yesterday that indictments were returned Jan. 16.

Several of those charged entered innocent pleas in Suffolk Superior court Thursday, while other cases were continued to next month.

Stanley M. Golenia, 38, a south Attleboro tax specialist, was accused of 49 counts of larceny, forgery and filing false documents in an alleged fraudulent tax refund scheme that netted him at least $33,000.

Minutemen now 5-2

Swimmers dominate

By NANCY A. BUKAR
Collegian Staff

It is becoming a regular event for the University of Massachusetts men's swim team to pound their opponents and they did it again, defeating the University of Connecticut Huskies by a score of 71-42 at Storrs on Wednesday night.

The Minutemen took first in all but three events and Craig Fuller broke his previous Boyden pool record and UConn's pool record for the 1000 yard freestyle with a 9:54.30.

UMass pulled away from the start, taking first and second in the 400 yard individual medley relay.

"It wasn't a tough meet. We knew after the first relay that they weren't really going for it," Coach Russ Yarworth said. "They pretty much rolled over for us."

The Minutemen officially won the meet after the three meter diving. Impressive showings by Jim Flannery, Chris Clarke and Mike Hoover added to the cause. Drew Donovan proved himself to be ever-reliable, posting impressive times.

UMass faces the University of Vermont at 2 p.m. Saturday at Boyden. Yarworth said, "Vermont should be the same (as UConn) for us."

Bobby Braun has 20 points and 17 rebounds against the Rams in the best game of his career with the Minutemen. Horace Neysmith has 14 points with Donald Russell netting 12. Carl Smith has 10 points and four rebounds.

Those four along with swingman Lorenzo Sutton will be the starters against Brendan Malon'es club.

URI is led by freshman Carlton Owens, right now the A-10 rookie of the year with a 13.23 average. Chris Scotti (6.75 rebounds per game) is the toughest Ram off the boards and will have to be bottled up by Braun and Neysmith.

The Minutemen never trailed in Kingston, taking a 40-30 lead at the half and holding off a late URI charge with solid defense (only one Ram basket) in the final two minutes.

"We have to be careful, we've beaten them but they'll be looking to avoid a sweep. We were picked for last by a lot of people and now we're respectable, teams will treat us differently," UM coach Ron Gerlufsen said about the game.

Owens, a six-four freshman guard from New York, leads the Rams in assists with 70, 4.12 a game and scoring. The Carl Smith-Owens matchup will be one of the highlights of the game.

Penn State wins it in OT, 71-65

Minutemen drop to 8-10 with loss, Braun leads with 16 points

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD — Penn State held off a late University of Massachusetts comeback to hand the Minutemen a disappointing 71-65 overtime loss last night at the Springfield Civic Center.

The Minutemen, now 8-10 and 4-5 in the Atlantic 10, lost a four-point halftime lead as the Nittany Lions, 6-10 and 2-6, changed defenses effectively and found their scoring touch.

"We're not a good enough team to play halfway and expect to win," UMass coach Ron Gerlufsen said. "This was a game we needed badly, and even when we had the lead I could sense there was trouble."

Penn State retook the lead from UMass with 6:40 to go in regulation, when freshman center Jim Newcomer hit a layup to make it 49-48. PSU went ahead by as many as five, 55-50, when Newcomer (14 points, 12 in the second half) hit again.

UMass battled back as freshman Matt Ryan drilled a three-pointer and Carl Smith nailed a jumper to tie it at 55 with 1:38 to go. Dwight Gibson (a game-high 18 points) gave Penn State the lead before UMass freshman Lorenzo Sutton hit a jumper with 36 seconds to go. The UMass defense forced overtime, allowing only a last-second bomb by Tony Ward that fell short.

In the overtime, Penn State's Craig Collins and Gibson combined for 11 points as the Lions outscored UMass 14-8.

UMass missed its chance to tie with 23 seconds left, down 66-63, when Donald Russell missed a three-pointer. Penn State hit three-of-four foul shots to wrap it up. Ware's Carl Chrabascz celebrated his homecoming with a dunk to end the game. Many of the 2,382 on hand were friends of the Penn State sophomore.

UMass was led by Bobby Braun's 16 points and 12 rebounds. Smith had 15, with Horace Neysmith and Sutton getting 14 and 10 respectively. Russell, plagued by the flu, had only seven.

In the first half, the Minutemen took a 29-25 lead after falling behind 7-0 in the first four and one-half minutes.

Braun took a nice feed from Neysmith and laid it in for UMass' first points and started a Minuteman comeback.

With a tremendous man-to-man defense suffocating Penn State, the Minutemen took a 10-9 lead with 12:47 to go on a Braun lay-up. UMass built the lead to as much as 10, 23-13 as they held the lines scoreless for 6:05 as Neysmith and Russell combined for 15 first half points.

Penn State got right back in it with eight unanswered points, to cut the lead to two, 23-21, with 3:13 left. Smith then scored the final six points for UMass including a turnaround jumper with one second to go in the half.

Neysmith had eight points in the period with Russell getting seven, but the key was the defensive play of freshmen Sutton and Ryan. The duo shut down the Penn State offense during the 12-2 run they gave that put UMass in the lead.

MINUTEMEN MUTTERINGS: In the latest A-10 statistics, before yesterday's game, Neysmith and Braun were tied for second in conference rebounding with 8.5 bounds-a-game. They were 3-4 in overall rebounding. Russell was sixth in overall scoring at 16.7 points-per-game, Neysmith was ninth at 14.4 ppg. In the league, Russell was ninth and Neysmith tenth.

Carl Smith was leading the league in assists with 78, 4.59-a-game. Smith has started all 46 games UMass has played since his rookie year. Neysmith has 99 of 100. Russell leads the team in steals with 128. Russell should break Mike Pyatt's all-time scoring record in the next five games.

Minutewomen aim for third straight

Full weekend for UM sports

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

It will be a busy weekend for all University of Massachusetts sports with every winter team seeing action.

The men's basketball team (see story) will host the University of Rhode Island at the Springfield Civic Center Saturday at 2 p.m. in the premiere contest of the weekend.

Today, the women's swim team looks for its second win when they host URI at the Boyden Pool at 7 p.m. They are 1-7 on the season.

Saturday, in addition to the men's hoop game, the women's basketball team will be in action, at Boston University. The Minutewomen, 8-11, have won two straight. Guard Barbara Hebl needs but four points to be the third women in UMass history to hit the 1,000 point mark.

The men's swim team, heading towards the New Englands with a 5-2 record, takes on Vermont at home on Saturday at 2 p.m. Freestylers Drew Donavan and Craig Fuller have been setting records for Coach Russ Yarworth's team and warrant a look. The meet's at Boyden pool.

Also on Saturday, the wrestling team, headlined by 126-pounder Chris Lee, ranked tenth in the nation, face Boston College at the Heights.

The women's gymnastics team will face Ivy League Cornell in the Boyden Gymnastics Center on Saturday at 1 p.m. Jennifer Pancoast has been looking impressi ve for coach Chuch Shiebler's team.

The men's and women's track teams travel to New Jersey for the Princeton Relays, the last meet before facing Dartmouth and then the New Englands. The UMass sprinters, both men and women, have been scoring well this season.

"It's the time of the year we look toward the big meets and prepare heavily for them," men's coach Ken O'Brien said. O'Brien cited the work of middle-distance man Steve Tolley, a freshman, and sprinter Rayle Crichlow.

The women have been led by sprinters Bridgette Booker, Leah Loftis, Kayle Morrison and middle-distance runner Barbara Cullinan.

The men's gymnastics team faces Division 2 national champion East Stroudsburg on Saturday at 1 p.m. in an away meet in Pennsylvania. The men are 4-1.

The UMass men's and women's ski teams under coach Bill MacConnell travel to Cannon Mountain, New Hampshire for the two-day Plymouth State tournament.

Minutemen host Rhode Island

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

Maybe statistics do lie.

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team is, if they beat Penn State last night, are 5-4 in the Atlantic 10 and in fourth place in the ten-team league.

Yet, in the latest batch of team statistics released by the league, UMass' highest ranking is sixth in rebound margin, and that a negative 0.53 boards a game.

UMass is no better than seventh in any of the other seven categories, yet are in the top half of the league in the most important statisitc, wins and losses.

The Minutemen hop to add another notch in the W column Saturday when they host the University of Rhode Island at the Springfield Civic Center at 2 p.m.

Tickets, with a valid UMass ID, are free at either the Boyden Ticket Office or at the lobby of the Civic Center. Three free buses will leave Boyden at 12:15 p.m. and leave the Civic Center approximately 15 minutes after the game. You need an ID for the buses as well.

UMass, 9-9 overall if they beat PSU, have already recorded a victory over the Rams, 72-68 in Kingston last week.

Former UMass student sues Health Services

DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

A former University of Massachusetts student has filed a malpractice suit against the state and University Health Services "for mis-diagnosing a pregnancy."

The suit was filed last week in Hampshire Superior Court, Northampton, by Jessica Colonna Wenner and her husband Bruce Wenner of New York - now the parents of a four year old girl, who claim that her right to have an abortion was denied in 1979 because she did not know she was pregnant in time for it to be performed.

According to the lawsuit, Wenner claims that two doctors and a nurse at the Health Services mis-diagnosed the morning sickness she experienced in the early stages of her pregnancy as a sympton of dyspepsia.

Wenner, a UMass senior at the time, did not realize she was pregnant until six months later when an abortion would have been illegal because of a law that prohibits abortion beyond six months of pregnancy.

In the lawsuit, Wenner charges University Health Services' employees with negligence which left her no choice but to have the child, which "caused her great injury and pain" and deprived her husband of sexual relations" while she was pregnant, the suit states.

The Wenners filed a similar suit in the U.S. District Court in Springfield in 1982 against individual University employees involved - Dr. Daniel Clapp, Dr. Paul Berman and Nurse Susan Fields,, but the case was dismissed because of the state law prohibiting the suing of individual public employees.

According to Jeffrey L. McCormick, the lawyer representing the University Health Services, in the current suit the state is named as the defendant because "only a public employer, not a public employee can be sued," he said.

Jonathan Souweine, the Wenner's lawyer, said "to the extent we have a claim it is against the corporate entity," and added that the previous case was dismissed because of "procedural issues" and not insufficient medical grounds.

According to Souweine, before this type of suit can be filed, it must first be reviewed by a medical malpractice tribunal comprised of a judge, a lawyer and a physician. In this case, the tribunal found the Wenners had grounds for a suit, he said.

However, according to the papers filed in Springfield, Health Services and the employees involved have denied any negligence.

In those papers, Dr. Berman said he first saw Wenner about a month after she became pregnant and before she got married. Berman said he did not order a pregnancy test despite her complaints of nausea because she "had a history of gastritis and long term indigestion."

According to the same documents, Berman said he knew Wenner had an appointment a week later to consult a nurse about gynecological problems but the records show she never kept her appointment.

Jacqueline L. Allen, a lawyer in the state attorney general's office in Boston who is representing the state, described this suit as "pretty unusual," representing "a new type of claim being made called a wrongful life case" she said.

"This whole area is developing" she said, adding that as a result "it is difficult to see how successful Mrs. Wenner's claim will be."

According to Souweine, although similar cases have been recorded - such as failed attempts at sterilization - there has not been a reported decision on this issue in Massachusetts and Wenner's claim is therefore one of "first impression," he said.

Grievance policy pushes on

By NANCY A. BUKAR
Collegian Staff

Students at the University of Massachusetts may soon have a formal grievance policy and procedure to dispute a professor's grading policy or how they are treated in a class.

The question of how grievances have been handled in the past is being investigated by provost Richard O'Brien, Gayle Wintjen, chairwoman of the Undergraduate Student Senates' Academic Affairs Committee, said. "For the most part, it's been an informal, go-through-the-hierarchy policy."

In the past, students have had to handle grievances directly with a professor, with no guidelines for proper practice on the professors' part. With a grievance policy in effect, professors would be required to announce the guidelines at the beginning of the course, include them in the syllabus and abide by them for the duration of the semester, Wintjen said.

The committee "has two more things to work out. It should be brought to the SGA within the next two weeks (for approval)," she said.

It's still in a draft. We still have some technicalities to be worked out on grade-changing. The Legal Services Office is gathering some cases and information to back up why a grievance policy is needed," she said.

The plan is modeled after the grievance policy procedure at Eastern Michigan University. "Gadlin gave me the model. The policy there was written by the faculty.

"All we had to do is modify it for our needs--things like grades and wintersession," she said.

If the plan becomes effective, each school at UMass would have a grievance committee with three faculty and two students to hear the case. Advisors would be allowed to recommend solutions to the problem and records would be kept on the situation. The final level of appeal would be a university-wide grievance board which would consist of three faculty members--two from the senate and one from the school where the grievance has been lodged--and two students selected by the student government president.

"This way, everyone will use the same procedure. Not only will it help students but it will also help professors," Wintjen said.

Fraternity rushes to run dry

By JONATHAN PERRY
Collegian Correspondent

Beer, the traditional socializing staple among college students, will not be served during this semester's fraternity rushes at the University of Massachusetts.

The decision was brought about be talks between Greek Affairs and the Inter-Fraternity Council and a subsequent IFU vote last semester to ban alcohol from fraternity rushes. The decision serves to increase the number of people interested in fraternity life while decreasing the number of those who attend the rushes merely to drink, according to those associated with Greek affairs.

"We want to attract the people that are turned off by the beer-drinking image fraternities have," said Jay Flynn, IFC president. "We want to show people the other side of what fraternity life is all about, that there is more than just parties. We don't want to reinforce stereotypes," Flynn added. He said that slides and movies of fraternity-related programs will be shown during the rush period of two to three weeks.

The "dry rush," which applies to all 13 fraternities at UMass (the nine UMass sororities have always held dry rushes), will be the first of its kind on campus.

Bob White, coordinator of Greek Affairs, said this concept is an emerging national trend. Several colleges and universities have already adopted this policy, due in part to the new national drinking age of 21. He added, however, that "even if the law were not going into effect this June, there is still a national trend toward dry rushes. We are very pleased and supportive of this policy," White said.

He added that fraternities will do their own policing, thus creating a check and balance to uphold the policy.

"This is part of the learning process," he said.

The fraternity community is also supportive of the policy.

"I think it's a good idea," said Mark Letson of the Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity. "Everyone's working together on this. In the past, we have gotten a lot of bad talk about partying too much, and this is our way to show that that is not what we're here for."

Randy Eckhardt, also of Lambda Chi Alpha, and the rush chairman for the IFC, feels that there are "a lot of positive attitudes toward the dry rush. We try not to stress liquor anyway," he said.

"We're giving it its first run this semester," Todd Thomas, Assistant Coordinator of Greek Affairs said. "Hopefully, by next fall it will be a well-oiled machine."

69 Americans injured in blast near U.S. airbase in Greece

ATHENS, Greece (AP)—Thirteen seriously injured U.S. servicemen and dependents among the 69 Americans wounded when a time bomb exploded in a crowded bar, were airlifted to a U.S. base in West Germany yesterday for treatment, U.S. and Greek officials said.

The Saturday night explosion injured 78 people in all and was the first reported terrorist attack on a facility frequented by U.S. military personnel in Greece. Greek authorities said no group had yet claimed responsibility, and Greek police declined to speculate on whom the bombers might be.

Seven Greeks, a West German and an Ethiopian were also reported injured when, Greek police said, a bomb went off under one of the tables at Bobby's, a bar in the seaside Athens suburb of Glyfada.

The bar is popular with many of the 1,500 U.S. Air Force personnel stationed at Hellenikon Air Base next the Athens airport.

A U.S. Embassy official, who, like the police spokesman, spoke on condition of anonymity, said the incident "was out of our jurisdiction and we will assist the Greek government in their investigation only if we are requested to."

Unusually violent night leaves 3 dead, 2 hurt in Boston

BOSTON (AP)—Three people were killed and three others, including an off-duty police officer, were wounded in four separate unrelated shootings Saturday in what police said was an exceptionally violent night in Boston.

The shootings, within four hours of each other, took place one day after Lt. Francis "Mickey" Roache was sworn in as acting police commissioner, replacing the retired Joseph Jordan.

Officers responding to a call at an apartment found a Vietnamese man in his mid-20s shot to death on a kitchen floor. Another man, identified as Cing Van Luu, 28, was found on a living room couch with a stomach wound. He underwent surgery at Boston City Hospital.

Police said no arrests were made and no motive was found for the shootings.

The second shooting was reported at about 6 p.m. at Harvey's Restaurant in the South End where police found the owner, Herman Samuels, 45, shot to death in the restaurant and a customer, Fernando Lugo, wounded. Each man had been shot twice, O'Toole said.

Three men who fled on foot from the restaurant were sought in the shootings, police said.

At about 7 p.m., a man was reported shot to death while walking down a street in the Mattapan section. O'Toole identified the victim as Terry Edwards, 18. He said police found neither a suspect nor a motive.

At 8:45 p.m., officer Harold E. Quinn Jr., 60, working a security detail at the Stop 'n' Shop Supermarket in the city's Brighton section, was wounded in the leg during a scuffle with an armed robber, O'Toole said. He said the officer's service revolver was taken by the assailant, and the assailant fired one shot into Quinn's right leg.

Dukakis says Reagan's cuts will cost Mass. $375 million

WASHINGTON (AP)—President Reagan's budget would cost Massachusetts at least $375 million next year and would have "a heartlessly devastating effect on the poor, the vulnerable and the middle class," Gov. Michael S. Dukakis said.

Dukakis said Reagan is continuing to seek steep increases in defense spending, while at the same time cutting further domestic programs that have been squeezed for the last four years.

"A preliminary examination of the president's proposed budget reveals it would cost Massachusetts more than $375 million next year through deep cuts or outright elimination of programs for education, child nutrition, welfare job training, transportation, general revenue sharing and urban development," Dukakis said in a statement released by the state's Washington office tht conducted the budget analysis. The federal budget will be delivered to Congress on Monday. Its contents became available Sunday.

Exchange programs offer worldly experience

Students adjust to cultural changes

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts senior Linda Somma was thankful for the lines that she found here after spending a year in Italy going to school in Florence.

"The University (in Italy) was very disorganized," Somma said. "Italians don't know how to form lines."

A student who participates in UMass' Overseas Study Program will be sure to experience many differences like this. But they wouldn't pass it up for anything.

"I enjoyed it a lot," Somma, a BDIC major in international public relations, said. "It took a lot of time to adjust, but it was great."

The Overseas program located in the International Programs Office in 239 Whitmore, to study.

Monica Johansson, a Swedish exchange student said, "It was great. With five weeks of intersession, I've been out traveling."

"The school of English (at Linkoping University in Sweden) isn't the same here," Johansson said. "I had a hard time at first. It took me a long time to write or read a paper."

The UMass Overseas Study program has been sending students all over the world since 1964 to work on their academic degrees.

Three hundred and seventy-three UMass students are studying abroad, for a year or half-year in 19 different countries such as Denmark, England, Ireland, Italy, Spain and France this year.

Students can also study in the summer in Argentina, China, Japan, Taiwan, England or France. Britain and the English speaking countries are the most popular choices of the entire program, Sterling Lamet, Overseas Study Coordinator said.

"It certainly has become more popular in the past six months to a year," he said. "Some do it (study overseas) for enrichment while others learn about their major and live abroad. It's kind of mixed."

Students from the School of Management and Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration have been studying abroad in large numbers, Lamet said. "If one was well-prepared, one could find a place to go for whatever major you have," he added.

"The people come back really different," Lamet said. "It really broadens their view of the world and the U.S."

Argentine scholar to lecture; faculty exchange possible

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Staff

The rector of the National University of Buenos Aires arrived yesterday for a two day visit to the University of Massachusetts, as part of a month-long stay in the United States sponsored by the United States Information Agency (USIA).

Francisco Jose Delich will meet with University administrators and faculty, tour the campus, and deliver a lecture at 4 p.m. today in Herter Hall.

In addition to being the chief administrator for the University of Buenos Aires, Delich has served as a board member of the UNESCO International Social Sciences Conference and as executive secretary of the Latin American Council for Social Sciences.

Last December, Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey and Barbara Burn, director of the Office of International Programs, travelled to Argentina for one week to visit three universities as part of an effort to arrange a scholarly exchange.

Robert A. Potash, Haring professor of history, said last month that the purpose of the exchange is to allow an Argentine professor to teach and study at the University, while sending a UMass professor to an Argentine University to do the same.

"The principle is that we would . . . teach Argentines about the U.S. and let American professors do research or teach about America in Argentinian Universities," Potash said.

Potash said the exchange may involve two Latin American professors who would remain at the University for a two year period. The University has a similar exchange with Colombia that is financed by the USIA, but government funding for the Argentine exchange is "hypothetical," he said.

The University is still working on the details of the exchange, Duffey said, including the possibility of seeking outside funding.

Duffey praised the quality of higher education in Argentina, noting that the National University of Buenos Aires has produced five Nobel Prize winners and that support will continue for the publicly funded institution.

Duffey and Burn have also discussed the exchange with the University of Belgrano and the University of Cuoto.

Commenting on his visit to Argentina, Duffey said that despite a certain wariness by Argentines toward Americans, he and Burn were warmly received and that "we had a good visit."

Police find homeless janitor in closet

By CHRIS POON
Collegian Staff

A custodian in Dickinson Dormitory was staying in a janitor's closet because he had no place to live, University Police were alerted of a suspicious individual on Thursday at 3:36 p.m. and discovered the homeless janitor. He was later referred to campus housing management.

Also in Friday's police report:

Johnson dormitory residents were evacuated at 12:27 a.m. Friday after a wastepaper basket fire triggered a smoke detector on the third floor. The fire was started by the careless disposal of smoking materials, and no damage was reported, police said.

A Sunderland man wanted by police for a parole violation was arrested at 5:09 p.m. Thursday as he was walking between Chadbourne and Brooks dormitories. The man was carrying a small quanitity of marijuana when Amherst Police arrested him on a parole warrant. He was held at the Hampshire County jail in Northampton.

A theft of a racquetball racquet valued at $115 was reported to police at 7:24 p.m. Thursday. Police said the racquet was locked to a basket in Boyden Gymnasium.

WOMEN'S FORUM

MONDAY — Dr. Lenore Walker, a nationally-known expert on violence against women, will be speaking at 4 p.m. in Tobin Hall, Room 304, on the "Psychological Impact of Violence Against Women."

June Jordan will give a lecture on "The Difficult Miracle of Black Poetry in America" at 4 p.m. in Memorial Hall Auditorium.

There will be an exhibition of Phyllis Wheatly's poems in the Special Collections and Rare Books Reading Room on the 25th floor of the library tower.

TUESDAY — At 5:30 p.m. there will be a "Take Back the Night March" planning meeting. Please check Campus Center schedule for room number.

THURSDAY — An International Women's Event" planning meeting, sponsored by SCERA, will take place at 6:00 p.m. Please check Campus Center schedule for room number.

FRIDAY — Debbie Fire, Jean Fineberg and Nydia Mata will be playing tonight at Sage Hall, Smith College, creating an evening of exciting music. The Hall is wheelchair accessible but the bathrooms are not. All women are welcome and the event is sponsored by the F.L.O.W.E.R. foundation and the Smith Lesbian Alliance.

Collective unites UMass disabled

By SHEILA FLAHERTY
Collegian Correspondent

A new student collective at the University of Massachusetts has been organized to provide emotional support for disabled students.

Abilities, Unlimited was formed last semester to unite the University's handicapped students, living on and off campus, who have all types of disabilities, including the "invisible disabilities" such as dyslexia, diabetes, and epilepsy. The group plans to petition for better accessibility to campus buildings, vice-president Carla Kszaszcz said.

"In order to really make a difference on campus, members of the group believe there is strength in numbers. As a body we have a bigger voice," she said.

The group now consists of only 10 members, but they hope to grow to include a substantial percentage of the disabled student body.

"We want this to be something for disabled students; giving them something to have pride in," Kszaszcz said.

Abilities, Unlimited's members also want to make the UMass community aware of the special problems a disabled student has to cope with.

"They have the same mental capabilities as an able student, yet they have the additional problem of overcoming a physical inconvenience," president Lisa Riskin said. Later this semester, the group will sponsor an appearance by Judy Human, a distinguished Jewish speaker who is active in handicapped affairs. Her lecture will focus on coping with a disability and independent living environments.

In May, the group will sponsor a "Theatre for the Deaf," and throughout the semester they plan to hold receptions and fund-raisers for the collective. In June, the group is hosting a conference for disabled students and parents of handicapped children.

Library marks milestone with poet's speech

Black poet June Jordan will speak today to celebrate the acquisition of the University of Massachusetts Library's two millionth book. Jordan will speak on "the difficult miracle of black poetry in America" at 4 p.m. in Memorial Hall.

The book, donated by Ralph Bromery, a former University chancellor, is Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral, by Phillis Wheatley. Wheatley was a black slave brought to Boston at the age of eight who learned to read English in sixteen months and wrote her first poem at the age of fourteen.

Jordan, an essayist, poet, editor and writer of children's books, is the author of Passion: New Poems, 1977-80, and Civil Wars. In addition, she has received numerous awards, including the Rockefeller grant for creative writing, the Prize of Rome in Environmental Design, the Nancy Bloch Award, the New York Times choice for one of the year's best young adult novels, and the New York Council of the Humanities award.

In addition to Jordan's speech, the library will also feature a collection of Wheatley memorabilia, including manuscripts, poems and letters. They will be on display all through February at the library except for today, when they will be at Memorial Hall.

The receipt of Wheatley's book occurs during Black History Month, as well as during the 10th anniversary of the Woman's Studies Program on campus.

OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

Shortchanging the future

Despite a projected $137 million state surplus for fiscal year 1985, the University of Massachusetts operating budget may decrease this year for the first time since 1977. Gov. Michael S. Dukakis recently recommended that the Board of Regents of Higher Education receive $143.8 million, a .36 percent drop from last year, then last week triumphantly announced a $64 million tax cut as the highlight of "the best budget document I have ever submitted to the state Legislature."

State Rep. James D. Collins (D-Amherst) was right when he told the faculty senate Thursday that the regents cutback, however small is "indefensible... the money from the tax cut would be be better spent on quality education. We're shortchanging our future."

The Commonwealth's public colleges and universities surely expect more from Dukakis, who has consistently condemned the Reagan administration's drastic reductions in social expenditures, including funds for education. The White House has renewed its attack on federal support for college students, proposing financial aid restrictions that could prevent thousands of us from returning to UMass three semesters from now. But at a time when public as well as private education is becoming more and more a privilege of the wealthy, the governor is trumpeting a one-time appeal to self-interest — a move which would eliminate $64 million in revenues but return less than $18 to each taxpayer — while neglecting Massachusetts' most valuable long-term investment, its higher education system.

Dukakis evidently feels he needs this measure to blunt the efforts of conservatives who might otherwise demand greater tax reductions. For this he is willing to gamble, hoping that the surplus won't evaporate by next February and leave him in the position of having to raise taxes back to their previous level as the 1986 gubernatorial campaign begins. The political pressures on him is intensified by the fact that the governors of two neighboring states with surpluses — New York and Connecticut — have also proposed tax cuts. But students will not forget that he has missed a chance to ally himself with us and future generations in the increasingly uphill battle to make quality education available to all.

A low value on human life

Herb Ramy

On Wednesday morning, January 30th, James David Raulerson was murdered. The murderers are well known by the authorities, but will never be prosecuted for their crime. The strangeness of this murder does not end here. As he was being killed newspaper reporters, his loved ones, and civil officials watched with varying degrees of interest. Raulerson's life was ended in an almost ritualistic fashion. His head was shaved, and he was strapped into a chair as thousands of volts of electricity were pumped through his body. The most tragic aspect of this case is that large segments of the population are behind the perpetrators of this crime.

For any of you still in the dark, the common term for what I've described is execution. Unfortunately, this simple change of a single word has probably made many of you feel much more comfortable. I say "unfortunately" because James Raulerson was murdered. The fact that he killed another human being is not being denied, but this does not condone killing him. In fact, I believe both acts to be on a par with each other. This eye for an eye mentality must stop, or soon we will be cutting the hands off of thieves and poking the eyes out of Peeping Toms.

If what I've said so far does not convince you, just think of the consequences of making a mistake. The mistakes would not be criminals put to some form of justice, they would be innocent men and women who were murdered. The argument that this only happens rarely only makes sense if one puts a very low value on a human life.

I agree that changes in our justice system must be made. For one thing, life sentences should be life sentences. Secondly, jails should be changed so that instead of producing better criminals they turn out people who are ready to take an active part in society.

All that capital punishment does is let us think that we're coping with the problem of violent crimes in this country. In reality, all we are doing is hiding the problem, and what better way to hide it than bury it six feet underground.

Herb Ramy is a Collegian columnist.

Letters to the editor

Fraternity's remarks 'humiliating, infuriating'

Walking home from class last Thursday night, I passed behind fraternity Phi Sigma Kappa. An all men's beer bash was in progress on the balcony.

One voice shouted, "Here comes another one." Another said, "Give it to us here, baby." And more yelling.

Just in case the men at that party might have the wrong idea that women enjoy this kind of thing, let me set them straight. It's humiliating and infuriating. But perhaps that's why men yell things at us, as an act of aggression. There's something pathetic about anyone who would indulge in that kind of frustrated act. But why should campus women have to tolerate it?

I hope that when the guys who made the remarks see this letter, they will recognize themselves, and feel ashamed.

Question of the week

Responses to the question of the week will be printed this Thursday. Please submit answers to the Collegian by Wednesday at 3 p.m.

Recently columnist Ann Landers asked women readers "Would you be content to be held close and treated tenderly and forget about the 'act'?" Of the more than 90,000 women who responded, 72 percent said, yes. Of those, 40 percent were under 40.

The question for this week for all readers, male and female, is "what would you rather, 'the act' or tenderness?"

Please check one: The 'act'or tenderness

Comments: (Note; must be 100 words or less).

Neysmith directs UMass over URI

Minutemen return with style, 76-65
Horace hits for 21, 10 rebounds

by PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD—As Ho goes, so go he Minutemen.

Make no mistake about it, senior co-aptain Horace Neysmith is the force. At 6-, he always gives away height under the boards, he was bypassed as a pre-season all-conference pick despite three years of impressive work and a few times this year, he will admit, he hasn't played to form.

But when he gets his game going, the University of Massachusetts wins and his game was in high gear Saturday at the Springfield Civic Center.

Neysmith scored 21 points, pulled down 10 rebounds and dished out five assists, all team highs, to lead UMass to a 76-65 Atlantic 10 victory over the University of Rhode Island.

"When we lost to Penn State (71-65 on Thursday), a game we should've won, I felt the intangibles like desire and intensity were missing," UMass coach Ron Gerlufsen said.

"But when we took the floor today, they were back. You could see it in the players, especially in Horace, he played a great game."

Neysmith, who moved into fourth place on the UMass all-time rebounding list with 538, scored in double figures for the eighth straight game. When he gets 20 or more points, UMass is 6-0.

"We learned a lesson against Penn State, we have to play together," Neysmith said. 'We're a good team, but we still can't let up against anybody and I don't think we will anymore. We showed that today."

The Minutemen, 9-10 overall and 5-5 in the league, jousted with the Rams, 7-12, 1-9, until URI's Bryan Mitchell (a game-high 23 points) tied the game at 22 with 4:34 to go in the half.

Point guard Carl Smith (15 points) then hit two free throws, Darryl Carter came back from four straight DNP's to swish a three-pointer before fellow sub Tom Emerson connected a soft 10-footer. Meanwhile, the tough UM defense was causing three straight turnovers as the Rams fell apart.

Smith popped in a jumper and with a second left in the half he converted on his patended "never fails last-second-turnaround" to complete an 11-point run and give UMass a 33-22 lead.

Smith, in the occasions when UMass has held for a last shot before the end of a half or game, has never failed to convert on the isolation clear out designed for him.

Bobby Braun (a solid six points and nine rebounds) then scored to open the second half and make it a 13 point unanswered streak before Mitchell hit.

"That was the game right there, we stunted their growth so to speak," Carter said. "We weren't doing that before, we would let some teams get back in it."

Carter made the most of his resurrection with seven points Emerson had four, Jackie Sheehan had five and Matt Ryan four as the bench had a good contribution.

URI cut it to nine, 57-48 in the second half as the ever-present Mitchell popped in a 15-footer with 5:34 to go.

Neysmith took it from there, hitting four straight free throws, a layup as Mitchell goaltended and a follow of a Braun miss after Donald Russell (seven points) canned a 15 footer from the left side. The streak ended with UMass up 67-52 with 3:04 left. The subs took it in from there.

The Minutemen shot a much-improved 71 percent from the line at 20-of-28. They scored 35 points off of 24 URI turnovers and enjoyed a 39-37 rebounding edge. Both Neysmith (six-of-six) and Smith (five-of-five) were perfect from the line. Smith also hit his fifth three-pointer in ten attempts.

Minutewomen take third straight, 62-60

By JOHN A. NOLAN
Collegian Staff

Barbara Hebel scored 14 points, including her 1,000th, and Tara Lewis added 12 as the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team edged Boston University 62-60 with a late comeback Saturday night in Boston.

It was the third consecutive win for the Minutewomen, 9-11, and their second victory over the Terriers this season.

"A close game like this could have gone either way," UMass coach Barbara Stevens said. "But they (BU) are a very erratic team that has been hampered by injuries and inexperience.

"A lot of people thought that our earlier win (59-53 at the Fairfield Tournament) was an upset, so we wanted to prove that we are one of the best teams in New England."

Hebel, a junior guard, entered the game just four points shy of 1,000 in her career and with her parents visiting for the weekend from Houston, the game took on special meaning.

"I was nervous," the 5-9 Hebel said. "My first two shots were short." But after a foul shot and a basket she stood just one point away.

With about six minutes to go in the first half, Hebel drove the lane and scored on a driving layup putting her over the top.

"I was really relieved when I got the points," Hebel said. "But they wouldn't have meant so much if we had lost. I was thinking more abut winning." She is one of three women to get 1,000 in UMass history.

UMass led at the half, 30-28, and after several lead changes the Minutewomen found themselves down by five points, 55-50, with about three minutes remaining. Calling time out, Stevens changed back to a man-to-man defense as opposed to a zone.

Responding to the switch, UMass reeled off the next seven points to take the lead at 57-55 and set the stage for the frantic final seconds.

With UMass leading 60-58, the Terriers missed an opportunity to tie as UMass pulled in a team rebound, (UMass outrebounded BU 46-38).

Hebel then dished off to center Karen Fitzgerald underneath for the Minutewomen's final points and the victory.

Swimmers jolt Vermont, 73-40

By NANCY A. BUKAR
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's swim team showed their opponents how to win once again as they dominated the University of Vermont Saturday at Boyden Poll, 73-40.

Coach Russ Yarworth expected the win. The goal of the meet he said was, "to try for some New England qualifying and swim some people in different events."

UMass placed first in all but three events. Drew Donovan broke to fool and school record for the 500 yeard freestyle, recently set by Craig Fuller, with a 4:42.95.

The Minutemen started off with a 1-2 win in the 400 yard medley relay, followed by Mark Wates' first place finish in the 1,000 yard freestyle and Mike Hoover's first in the 50 yard freestyle.

UMass took a 1-2-3 in the 200 yard individual medley with Fuller, Chris Clarke and Jim Flannery respectively. Keith Pisani took first in the one-meter diving and Steven King took first in the 200 yard butterfly.

The Catamounts' John Linell took first in the 100 yard freestyle with a 50.64 but the Minutemen swept the 200 yard backstroke with Hoover, Paul Hartnett and Peter Chouinard. Pat Mullen took second in the three-meter diving and UVMs' Randy Frost placed first.

Fred Marius and Chris Clarke finished one-two in the 200 yard breaststroke and the team of Flannery, Paul McDonough, Fuller and Donovan took first in the 400 yard freestyle relay.

"We swam very well," Yarworth said. "We usually beat them."

In other UMass results from the weekend, the gymnastics teams had a tough time of it as both the men and women lost.

The men fell to 4-2 with a 262.20-253.05 defeat at East Stroudsburg. The women, 0-3, lost to Cornell 167.5-160.

UM will fund special hiring, says provost

By DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts will set aside $250,000 a year to improve the number of minorities and women in the faculty ranks, Provost Richard O'Brien has announced.

O'Brien, speaking at the last faculty senate meeting said the money will go into a "Special Opportunity Fund" to be used to hire seven women and minority faculty members each year over the next decade.

Referring to the ethnicity and gender of current faculty, O'Brien said in an interview yesterday, "it isn't that the situation is deplorable; but we are not where we want to be."

Statistics from the UMass Office of Affirmative Action based on a March 1984 census date, show that:

•92 percent of the entire faculty is caucasian and of these 82 percent is male.

•Three percent of the entire faculty is black. Less than one percent is female.

•Those of Asian Pacific origin comprise three percent of the faculty, and less than one percent of these is female.

•Hispanic faculty account for two percent and there is only one faculty member in the American Indian/Alaskan Native category.

According to a statement issued by Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey and O'Brien in January, recommendations to make appointments under the fund may come from any department and will be transmitted by the appropriate Dean to the Provost, who will work closely with the affirmative action office in making the final decision.

Joyce Berkman, a history professor and member of the faculty senate committee on the status of women, described the creation of the fund as "long overdue and representing a potentially superb way of bringing women and minorities onto campus."

However, she expressed concern that "the fund might make departments feel they are having women and minorities thrust upon them" and might, therefore, not be too "welcoming."

Her other reservation is that the existence of the fund could "be a way of excusing hiring women and minorities for existing openings," she said.

For example, Berkman explained, when a regular opening occurs, a department might think "we can hire a white male for this because we can bring in a woman or minority from the fund."

"I don't want it to be used so that white males are hired out of one pool and women and minorities are hired out of another," said Charlotte Rahaim, chairwoman of the senate's committee on the status of women.

Castallano Turner, chairman of the committee on the status of minorities, said the fund was "a step in the right

UM and Buenos Aires to trade scholars

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Staff

The United States and Argentine governments moved one step further yesterday to improve relations and cooperation with the signing of an agreement to begin a scholarly exchange between the University of Massachusetts and the National University of Buenos Aires (UBA).

Francisco Jose Delich, rector of UBA, and UMass Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey signed the agreement during a luncheon with area reporters, Provost Richard O'Brien and other administrative staff, which was later followed by a lecture in Herter Hall. Delich's two-day visit to UMass was part of a month-long trip to the U.S. sponsored by the United States Information Agency.

The exchange between UMass and UBA will involve professors, not students, and Delich emphasized the need to improve the quality of younger professors.

The agreement states that UBA will send faculty members to UMass "for advanced study and research in field of American studies, primarily U.S. history, for a period of one to two years. They may come to (UMass) as visiting scholars, degree graduate students, or non-degree graduate students."

In exchange, UMass "will send faculty members to UBA for periods of several weeks up to one academic year to lecture, teach and consult in the field of American studies," the agreement states.

"Maybe we can take 10 to 15 professors for the highly specialized teaching and maybe one or two more for associated research," Delich said.

During the day Delich discussed the seperation of public universities from military governance and public presence, the reappearance of 1,000 "missing" teachers, the start of democratic rule and the number of women entering UBA, as reasons for increased interest in higher education in Argentina.

Francisco Jose Delich, rector of University of Buenos Aires, Argentina.

UBA, Delich said, has a current enrollment of about 200,000 students, and next year's entering class is estimated at 80,000. The University also employs about 10,000 full and part-time teachers, he added.

Delich said one priority of Argentine higher education is to increase the study of new technology.

"We need to push society into computers and the use of communications and the mass media," he said, adding that the continuation of medical research and the social sciences are also important.

A-Bomb hurt vegetation

By BETSY SCHNEIDERS
Collegian Correspondent

A University of Massachusetts professor has discovered that plants near the point of the first nuclear bomb drop suffered six times the genetic damage than outside the area and is now studying his discovery at school.

Edward Klekowski of the Botany Department traveled to Nagasaki, Japan last summer to examine the effects of nuclear radiation on plant genes and along with his colleague, Shigeo Masuyama of the Tokyo Women's Christian University, made the discovery using maps to determine what parts of the forest were affected by the blast. An 80-kilometer radius from the point on the ground below there the bomb burst, called the hypocenter, was studied.

They then collected plants that appeared unaffected by the blast and brought them back to UMass "because of the excellent facilities here," Klekowski said. They tested the ferns to measure the extent of damage to each plant and how many plants wre damaged.

They found that there were certain areas with much more frequent and extensive damage, but there was no set pattern to them.

PERUVIAN BLESSING— Pope John Paul II gives Mass to thousands in Trujillo, Peru yesterday.

Senate targets defense, Weinberger against it

WASHINGTON Members of the Senate Armed Services Committee told Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger on yesterday that Congress may try to cut by nearly half the spending growth proposed in the Pentagon's $277.5 billion budget.

Weinberger warned that such a reduction would imperil President Reagan's military build-up, remove Soviet incentives to negotiate seriously at nuclear arms talks, and might compel the mustering out of two divisions of combat troops, triggering increased domestic unemployment.

Testifying before the committee, he urged Congress to "stay the course" on "a longrange program to restore and strengthen U.S. national security."

"The success of that program hangs in the balance," Weinberger said. "I would like to urge that Congress not be lured by the deficit situation into making additional reductions to defense."

But senator after senator from both parties made clear theybelieve reductions in the defense buildup will be made, with the only question being how much and where. None were heard to predict that defense spending will not be trimmed.

Sen. Barry Goldwater, R-Ariz., the committee chairman, said that while he opposes a freeze in defense spending as "highly irresponsible," he believes that "all areas of the government have helped to create the deficit and now all must contribute to reducing it."

"Defense is no exception," Goldwater said.

Sen. John Stennis, D-Miss., a former Armed Services chairman and a staunch military advocate, told Weinberger: "I have a growing apprehension about the financial affairs of this government...I may not vote for all these items this year...I'm going to vote for something that I think has a chance of passing."

Lawmakers complain about military spending

WASHINGTON - Republicans and Democrats complained yesterday that President Reagan's newly released budget for 1986 was too generous to the Pentagon, but also agreed the administration will win at least some of its requestd $39 billion in domestic spending cuts.

House Majority Leader Jim Wright, D-Texas, predicted Congress would approve "some variation" of the $974 billion plan that the president formally signed over in a White House ceremony, but even Republicans edged away from embracing the president's proposals in their entirety.

House Majority Leader Robert Michel, R-Ill., described Reagan's plan as a "starting point," and said, "I do not endorse every recommendation...."

In the Senate, majority Republicans repeated their vow to seek cuts in the president's proposed $30 billion hike in Pentagon spending.

GOP Leader Robert Dole of Kansas proposed cutting Reagan's defense increase in half, while Sen. Mark Hatfield of Oregon, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, declared that a defense spending freeze was the "absolute minimum requirement."

Hatfield, among the budget's sharpest critics, said Reagan had proposed a "fantasy budget conceived in the land of never-ending deficits."

Democrats responded with some of their sharpest criticism since Reagan won re-election last November in the a 49-state landslide.

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., D-Mass., said Reagan's proposal "takes the pain of budget cutting directly to Middle America," but said it would receive "serious consideration" in Congress.

Rep. William Gray, D-Pa., chairman of the House Budget Committee, also called on Reagan to accept cuts in his defense proposal, but said he hopes to lower deficits next year by $40 billion to $50 billion, close to the president's goal of $51 billion.

Reagan proposed cutting deficits to $180 billion next year through a series of spending freezes, deeper cuts and outright terminations in domestic programs.

The total of $39 billion in domestic cuts includes ending the $4.6 billion revenue sharing program to local governments; imposing larger costs on the users of Medicare; eliminating the federal subsidy for Amtrak; cutting the pay of federal workers by 5 percent and making deep cuts in farm and education programs. The Small Business Administration would be abolished, as would the Job Corps and the Legal Services Corp.

White House budget will affect everyone

WASHINGTON — Behind the enormous totals in President Reagan's new federal budget, there's a more detailed litany of good and bad news for individual Americans.

Waiting for a public housing vacancy? Could be a long, long time.

Hoping for a raise, soldier? Sounds good.

Needing federal money for college? Still a chance but it's fading.

Worried about your Social Security? Don't fret, for at least another year.

In general, the Reagan administration says virtually everyone would be better off if Congress passed the president's budget without changes—something Congress is very unlikely to do.

But that's in general. Here are a few of the virtually countless effects that passage of the budget would have on particular groups of individuals.

—Housing: If you're looking for federal help here, this isn't the budget you've been waiting for. It calls for a two-year halt in new housing subsidies for the poor and elderly, some of whom have already been waiting years for public housing apartments. And it also proposes increases in fees paid by veterans and Federal Housing Administration borrowers, adding as much as $2,850 to the cost of a typical Veterans Administration-backed loan.

—Jobs: Young people looking for job training wouldn't be able to find it in the Job Corps, which is now training 40,000 people between 15 and 22. Too expensive and doesn't really work, the administration says. Job-training block grants for the states would stay about the same, but a federal program training adults for permanent work would be cut as would the Summer Youth Employment Program.

—Students: The budget for student aid would be cut by $2.3 billion, wiping out loans, grants and other financial assistance for more than 1 million college students. Hardest-hit: those with family incomes of $25,000 or more.

—Federal pay: If you're one of the millions working for the federal government, you could be looking at a 5 percent salary cut—unless you're a uniformed member of the armed forces, in which case a 3 percent raise would be in order.

—Health and retirement: The budget allows for a cost-of-living increase in Social Security payments for retirees, just as the president promised. But it would cap Medicaid payments to the states for health services to the poor and would freeze Medicare payments to hospitals and physicians to pay for medical care for the elderly and disabled. Medicare recipients' insurance premiums would also rise.

Hart denounces 'selfishness' of Republicans

BOSTON - Colorado Sen. Gary Hart, in an address he insisted was not a prelude to an agenda as a presidential candidate, on Monday urged Democrats to denounce the "selfishness" of the Republican right-wing and foster a "new patriotism."

Appearing before about 400 people in historic Faneuil Hall, Hart said "the test of our present course is not the satisfaction and sense of well-being it may bring today, but whether this course guarantees and strengthens our shared values for decades to come."

He said "the Republican right-wing speaks the language of our values while acting against them" and that members of the most conservative element of that party "exalt selfishness and ... worship the moment."

Hart cited "the appalling narrowness of the Republican vision he said is cloaked in a "peculiar brand of patriotism that consists of nationalistic flag-waving, public relations symbolism and military interventionism."

Author says wife abuse at 'war proportions'

By LAURA KOESTER
Collegian Staff

Men who beat their wives are not abnormally sadistic but use violence to control women, according to Lenore Walker, who spoke to a group of psychology students in Tobin Hall yesterday.

Walker, a psychologist and author of the book Battered Women said "the number of incident of abuse are alarming; it is of war proportions."

She said that her research indicates that one out of two women will be physically, sexually or psychologically abused at some point in her life.

Because information on wife battering incidents was so sparse during the 1970s, Walker and a few colleagues set out to collect their own data. They interviewed 400 battered women for 6 to 8 hours each.

Walker described a three-phase pattern that occurs in most abusive situations. The first is a tension building phase in which the woman senses her partner is tense and does whatever she can to avoid escalation to the the second phase, when the acute battering incident occurs.

"She can control the rate of escalation, but not the inevitability of it," said Walker.

"As the situation becomes more explosive, the woman loses her ability to predict what behaviors will work. I have become very appreciative of the enormous amount of knowledge women use in lowering the amount of danger to themselves and others," Walker said.

The third phase is "loving contrition," a period of calm marked by the absence of tension.

"Some women will push the incident to an explosion so they can name the time and the place it will happen, so they can feel more in control," she said.

Walker said 90 percent of male batterers come from troubled homes in which they fear their fathers. Research on aggressive boys showed that in homes where there was a reported abuse, negative behavior toward females in the house was reinforced and rewarded. Seventy percent of batterers were also involved in other violence outside the home, according to Walker.

"We are no longer picky about separating child abuse from wife abuse, because they are so staggeringly high and inter-related," said Walker.

"There is an unnatural proportion of women as victims and men as perpetrators. However, more boy children are hurt by both men and women, and we found a higher number of sexual abuse of boy children than we had previously suspected."

Walker said the factors preventing women from leaving an abusive situation come from women narrowing their perceptions of their options to the safest choices. The danger women face in leaving is very real. However, we now have an underground railroad so we can hide women until the danger is past.

Child care alive and well on campus

By DANIEL SOBEL
Collegian Staff

Ask any parent what it's like raising children and many will say it's a full time job. And when parents are also students or working professionals the job becomes even more difficult.

With three year-round child care centers plus referral and baby-sitting services, the University of Massachusetts seeks to ease this burden for about 150 students and faculty who have children.

The centers, which cater mostly to infants, toddlers, and preschool children, maintains an Affirmative Action policy which "particularly seek(s) to support low income, single parent, and third world families," Elizabeth Perkins, director of university child care said.

"We have a multicultural system. It's very important that we have different languages and different backgrounds," said Perkins, who has been with the system for five and a half years and has a three-year-old daughter, Daisy, who attends the Grass Roots School at Bowditch Lodge, near the Southwest Residential Area.

The other two centers are New World Day School, also near Southwest, and North Village Children's Center, located at the North Village Apartments.

Child care was first established at UMass in 1943 to meet the wartime needs of University families, but closed with the ending of the war, Perkins said.

Then, in 1970 a new service was created after students began demonstrating for child care needs in the Whitmore Administration Building.

"Students who had kids had nowhere to put their kids when they were in school," Perkins said.

She said things are running a lot more smoothly for the centers than they have in the past.

"It's getting much, much better, but it's been tough. What happens in many child care centers is a bind of not wanting to charge parents too much, and having to exploit staff with low pay," she said.

Perkins said she is well aware of recent cases of child abuse being reported around the country, and at a December Child Care Advisory Board meeting the centers accepted a draft of Procedures for Prevention of Child Sexual Abuse.

"Children need to develop a sense that it is their own body and they must learn to say no," she said.

One parent involved with child care at UMass said, "Overall I've been very happy with it. My daughter went there and my two and a half-year-old son is in his second year there. It's been a great help to us."

David Lafond, a 29-year-old senior history major and his wife Jean, a 27-year-old junior art student, have two children and are both full-time students. Lafond works part-time and the family receives federal grants and welfare benefits.

He also said the system is not always perfect. Waiting lists and inadequate funding are problems, he said.

"People with money don't seem to cough up enough. To get money you have to do a lot of haggling and wheeling and dealing," he said.

The system is funded by parent fees, federal funds from the Undergraduate and Graduate Student senates, an annual University budget, and state and federal government grants for subsidized child care.

Weekly fees for student families are based on a sliding scale, depending on the family's size and income, while most non-students pay a set rate.

direction" and that while he understood the concerns of potential abuse "in the spirit in which it was given, I don't think it will happen."

The creation of the fund represents the University reaffirming "its commitment to the concept of affirmative action," Provost O'Brien said.

In another step to represent such a commitment, O'Brien said the affirmative action office will work directly with his office, not with the chancellor's office as done in the past.

The Provost's office has always been the center of where faculty appointments take place and this move will bring the affirmative action office "more into the mainstream of the action," O'Brien observed.

According to Rahaim, the University is not so much reaffirming its commitment to affirmative action as "affirming it for the first time," she said.

"If there has ever been any commitment we would have seen more than one percent increase in women faculty over the last 14 years," she said.

"I'm looking forward to the provost showing us he really means it."

Heavy weekend for campus security

By CHRIS POON

A male jogger was punched in the face on Clark Hill Road in Amherst Sunday night, University of Massachusetts police reported.

Police said the man was assaulted by two people who got out of a car after trying to drive up a hill in the snow.

The jogger was treated for cuts on his nose at the UMass infirmary and then released.

Police said they have a possible identification of the car's license plate number. There was one witness on the scene and the incident is still under investigation.

In other police reports:

- A 52-year-old Sunderland woman was issued a trespassing warrant by campus police after she threatened to shoot a man in the Campus Center Friday night. When the police arrived, no gun was found. She was warned that if she returned to the Campus Center, she would be arrested immediately.
- A weight lifting set was reported stolen Sunday night from a weight room on the 19th floor of John Adams dormitory. The theft occurred sometime between Friday and Sunday. Police said the locked room was accessible to several residents and the equipment was valued at $150-170.
- The theft of a television set valued at $300, was reported Saturday morning in John Quincy Adams. The owner reported that the theft from his unlocked room occured over a period of 15 minutes.
- Two jackets and a camera were reported stolen from the 15th floor lounge of John Quincy Adams dormitory Sunday afternoon. The value of the items were estimated at $250. It was reported they were stolen in a half-hour period.

Police also reported several car accidents and vandalism.

- A 1985 UMass police cruiser received $300 worth of damage after a woman backed her 1982 Subaru into the car on Commonwealth Avenue in Amherst Friday afternoon. The woman was charged with failure to use care in backing up. The Subaru received about $200 worth of damage.
- Two people were slightly injured after two cars collided at Massachusetts and Commonwealth Avenues in Amherst Saturday night. A 1976 Dodge driven by a student slid through the intersection while trying to stop for a red light. He hit a 1983 Honda Civic driven by an employee of Housing Services.
- A broken windshield and shoe impressions on the hood of a 1977 Ford were reported Saturday afternoon in P-lot near Alumni Stadium. The owner reported $150 worth of damage.

The most damaged areas had six times more genetically defective plants that the average number of defected plants outside the 80 kilometer radius. It could possibly be due to more fallout in these areas, Klekowski said.

"Hopefully this summer we will be able to return to where the wind carried the majority of the fallout," he said.

This experiment would be the first of its kind to determine whether the initial blast and fallout or the lingering fallout has more damaging potential.

Klekowski said he and his wife are donating much of her time to cultivating spores so the next generation of ferns can also be tested. When these plants become old enough to test they will prove useful in determining if the damage is passed onto the fern offspring.

"UMass is paying for some petri dishes and Tokyo University is paying for Shigeo's salary," he said. Klekowiski and Masayuma are paying for the remainder of the costs.

Advice from someone who knows

M. David Lee III

This is a very difficult letter for me to write, but I feel I have to write it. Last semester was probably one of the hardest semesters for me and it was because for the first time, I began to deal with an issue that I had kept inside for a long time.

Because I chose to address this issue, I am now a victim, a statistic, a person who feels very alone. I, for six years of my life, have been dealing with being raped. For years I wasn't sure about how to deal with it. I had sat through many a lecture on rape and had fought with myself about the issue, but still I did nothing. Nothing until this year. I am currently involved in a criminal case that will put this "man" behind bars and I feel like for the first time in my life I have taken control of this situation.

When I first told someone about what had happened all I could think about was, "What will people think?" It took me two months to tell my father and another month to tell my mom. I felt like I had been stripped of something that I knew I could never recover again. I told no one about what had happened. I tried my hardest to continue my life without anyone ever knowing about what had happened. For those six years, I did the best job that I could keeping it away from everyone, but it was on a Monday night during a rape workshop that I began to realize what had really happened to me.

That first step, telling someone, was a painful one, but one that was terribly important. In some respects I felt like I had done something bad, that what had happened was my fault, but it wasn't. I was raped; I was the victim. I was very nervous for my brother because I knew that this person had spent time with my brother and other young kids his age. It was for that reason primarily that I wanted to go ahead and press charges. I was scared for my brother, for myself, and for any other child that this may have happened to.

I have heard stories about how some people have been raped and haven't gone through with the police action. Although it took me a long time to deal with it, I did and I hope that those people who may have been put in such an awful position will also come out and deal with it. When I first decided to go ahead with everything, I thought my whole life would fall apart and that I would have no support whatsoever, but that didn't happen. Through this whole thing the support of my friends has been great. I have been working with the Everywoman's Center and they have given me so much support that I can't even begin to thank them enough. The support that you may need, will be there; trust me, I know.

My life has stumbled in the past months, but I am at the point where I can change things. I have gone to court, I know what it is like to go through this. I beg that anyone who has suffered a rape and who has not dealt with it, will sit down and think about what has happened. Most people who rape get away with it, but we have got to change this statistic. If you are a person who has been raped, get in contact with someone—a friend, counselor, anyone—but don't bear the pressure yourself. You are not alone.

My life has changed now and I am not the same person that I was when I entered college. With the support of my friends, family, and the Everywoman's Center, I am "taking care of business." Life goes on after you do something about a rape and life will go on if you choose not to deal with it. I hope that whatever I have said might help anyone. Even if it gets people to think about it more, then this column has helped someone.

Letters — Ignored?

I actually read my Weekly Bulletin (a UMass listing of events) today. Although it was dated Jan. 31, I for some reason (one not very clear to me now) assumed that it would mention some of the University events related to Black History Month.

I was wrong.

I read through it twice to make sure I had not missed anything. I was wrong again. There was nothing there. No mention of any event that is even remotely connected to the month-long celebration.

They mentioned the University Gallery showing; but made no mention of the Augusta Savage Art Gallery (first floor New Africa House). They mentioned recitals and concerts; but made no mention of the "Celebration" of black music featuring the Fred Clayton Quintet (open to the public in the Hampden Dining Commons in the Southwest Residential Area). They mentioned several lectures but no mention of Nomazizi Sokudela (Sunday).

I was not shocked. I was not even surprised. I really wasn't. I know that the Weekly Bulletin is supposed to reflect the University happenings for the week. The fact that nothing was mentioned suggests to those that rely on this and other administrative communiques that black History Month is Not Happening At the University of Massachusetts in Amherst.

I sincerely hope that I am wrong a third time.

A verb is . . .

Last Wednesday you reported that Jill Conway is ". . .leaving to multi-volume history of women in America." Last Thursday you asked the campus "What would you rather, 'the act' or would you be content with simply tenderness?" (Used to be, that "rather" was followed by "do" or "have" or other verbs.)

The Collegian is to be congratulated for its pioneering spirit. In refusing to caveat your writers about the differences between verbs and other words, you are opening up whole new worlds of language usage. In the past I would always beware myself against unorthodox syntax. Now, thanks to precedent set in the Collegian, I am free to enverb with abandon.

Nuclear bomb can breed restraint

William J. Spain

The president speaks of it as a noble objective. His liberal opposition also views it as a desirable goal. Clergymen and kindergartners have publicly stated their approval of it. People everywhere hope and pray for it. Finding something on which there is more universal agreement would probably be impossible.

I am speaking, of course, of the total elimination of nuclear weapons from this earth. Sure sounds like a great idea, doesn't it? We would save billions of dollars and nobody would have to grow up knowing that they could be turned into radioactive cinders with little or no warning. Together with our adversaries we could forge a planet where everyone has enough to eat and hope for the future. The whole species would become the envy of the galaxy.

Not bloody likely. Getting rid of our nuclear capabilities without dumping our conventional ones first would be disasterous. The only thing that has delayed World War III this long is the fact that both sides know that it would be the last war. Mutual Assured Destruction may seem like a sick concept to some people but let's compare it to, say, trench warfare. I would much rather take a chance on having the whole world go up in one fiery holocaust than be assured of sending more generations of young men out to have their bodies invaded by lead and steel.

That is exactly what would happen. Do not forget who is holding the most awesome conventional arsenal these days. If the Soviets were not sure that we would nuke them, they would conquer the rest of Europe in a second. They outnumber us so bad that it would make the Nazi blitzkrieg look like a Risk game. That government is full of really nasty people who would love to take us out at the first opportunity.

I am well aware that the U.S.S.R. does not have a monopoly on craziness or evil. We also have what you could describe as a rather spotted history when it comes to using our war machine. American governments have contributed to a lot of suffering in this world. Thousands upon thousands of innocent civilians were crippled and killed by our indiscriminate bombing in southeast Asia. Tyrannical scum like the Shah of Iran and Anastasio Somoza of Nicaragua have been given American arms to use against their own people.

Right now we have a chief executive who thinks that we represent absolute good and the Soviets represent absolute evil. Add to that a Secretary of Defense who was described by an Israeli prime minister as "a prime candidate for psychoanalysis" and you get a perfect atmosphere for war. These two characters are presiding over a trillion (that looks like this—1,000,000,000,000) dollar arms build-up. Meanwhile, children die from malnutrition at a rate of more than 40 per minute. Some things are more obscene than nuclear war.

All that is presently holding back the bunch of defective units that pass for world leaders is the knowledge that they too will go poof if they start pushing buttons. History has shown us that when people attain positions of great power, they begin ranking ideological objectives over human lives (except their own, that is). The invention of nuclear weapons has made world domination by any one nation impossible. To even attempt it would be suicide not only for the poor slobs in uniform but for everyone else as well. That has a certain kind of twisted justice to it which appeals to me.

Isn't the seder on Passover? Yes, but there is also a kabbalistic (Jewish mystical) tradition of celebrating a seder on the eve of this festival. This seder meal involves various combinations of fruits and wines which reflect both the traditional themes of growth and renewal as well as contemporary expressions around themes of identity, interconnectedness, ecology, and nuclear weapons.

Blues guitar by Seals

Son Seals
Bad Axe
Alligator Records

By JACK BRESNAHAN
Collegian Staff

Son Seals is becoming an increasingly popular blues guitarist, and rightly so. He has played several times in the area in recent years, and at the Blue Wall last semester as part of UPC's ongoing blues series. Although he is a relatively young blues stalwart at 42, Seals has over 30 years of playing experience. He has developed a distinct blues sound. His great live blues shows are transcribed on this album, albeit a little cleaner and more calculated. But with this new album Seals releases a bevy of fine tunes that should make for more hot live performances.

Some of the real nuggets here are "Goin' Home (Where the Women Have Meat on Their Bones)" and "Friday Again," on which the lyrics tell a particularly vivid blues story. The latter features some solid organ work by longtime player Sid Wingfield, and exhibits the patented Son sound. These two plus "Cold Blood" were included at the Blue Wall show held before this album was released. Playing his Guild guitar that he purchased from a priest several years ago, Seals' licks are predictably divine. Joining the festivities is Johnny B. Gayden, regularly the bassist for Albert Collins and the Icebreakers.

Side two begins with "Out Of My Way," about a woman who has to get her act together (she is ". . .high as a Georgia pine"). Seals has a great way of calling her with his guitar. Another chestnut is "I Can Count On My Blues," which finds Seals doing some serious signifying. Billy Branch, who plays with Willie Dixon and is on Johnny Winter's latest album plays some background harp here. On "Can't Stand To See Her Cry," a very introspective song, Seals comments, ". . . if I gotta live my life/without you woman/I'd rather be dead/and in hell." He finishes off with "Person To Person," on which he's suffered every day his woman's been gone.

Seals has evolved from a kid listening to blues at his father's juke joint, playing drums on the chitlin circuit, to backing up the late Muddy Waters and BB King, and finally he's a headline act. In constantly giving the blues his all, he has exposed his soul. And believe me, behind that imposing countenance there is a man of genuine warmth, feeling, and expression, which this new record exudes.

Black woman's poetry book acquired by library

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

A lecture, poetry reading and presentation celebrating the acquisition of the works of acclaimed poet Phillis Wheatley by the Universtity of Massachusetts Library was held last night at Memorial Hall.

The acquisition of Wheatley's poems is the library's millionth volume of rare books. Wheatley is the first black woman to publish poetry in North America and the third woman to be published in North America.

Wheatley's book, Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral, was bought in an auction in London by ex-chancellor Randolph Bromery. The book was published in London in 1773.

June Jordan, poet, essayist, editor and writer of children's books, delivered a moving and profound lecture about Wheatley. She read a sonnet about Wheatley's numerous accomplishments as a poet, beginning with the time Wheatley was displayed on an auction block to be sold as a slave at the age of seven.

"Was it a nice day? It doesn't matter. It was not natural, she was a first," went Jordan's refrain.

Collegian photo by Mitch Druetch

June Jordan, poet and essayist, pays tribute to Phillis Wheatley yesterday at Memorial Hall, in celebration of the acquisition of Wheatley's book of poetry published in London in 1773.

As a poet, Wheatley, who called herself "Africa's muse", accepted American values, concentrating on issues of morality, religion and "the great cause."

But that all changed when her mistress, Susannah died. Then Wheatly married, bore three children and died. Although the quality of her work remained high, her work was not published due to its context.

"As long as we remain a child of slavery we will be beloved, sheltered and praised, but not otherwise," Jordan said.

In an interview after the lecture, Jordan said she hopes the collection of her poems at UMass would let young black people "see what somebody with nothing going for her and many things against her was able to accomplish at such a young age.

Although she teaches a class at New York University at Stonybrook on the art of black english, she wrote Wheatley's poem in standard english out of respect for her.

Jordan said she felt connected to Wheatley while researching on her life and works: "To me, she is like a relative."

Jordan became acquainted with Wheatley's poetry "a long time ago," but it wasn't until she submerged herself in the works that she started to appreciate her talents.

Call to the present

A Call to the Future
By Yadira Betances

I heard a million voices from the past call my name.
Their thunderous and vibrant cries did not make me tremble
for I recognized their sounds.
They were the voices of victims, of slaves,
sharecroppers, marchers, rebels and heroes.
The words, though coming from years long lost in the winds of time carried in essence truth,
a truth we experience today as a race-economic deprivation, social enslavement, mis-education prejudism, political injustice....
All because of our skin color;
Perhaps the wrong skin color.
Just because God tanned us a little too much we were bonded into slavery to build the backbones of America from the sweat and toil of our backs and we gained no recognition, but were excluded from the civilization we built.
And we survived and a white hand broke off our chains while another tied them up again and we became slaves once more all because of our wrong skin color.
Like in a dream,
the words kept coming faster and faster from slavery, to emancipation, to the movement right down to today.
And this babel of voices spoke of hardships and of survival.
And they taught me how to struggle,
and they taught me how to fight,
and I learned not to grow weary,
and I learned self-confidence, and I learned that the future
was dependant upon ourselves.

Beckwourth Pass, the lowest point across the Sierra Nevada mountains, was one of the routes settlers traveled to get to the Northwestern part of theUnited States and was discovered by James Beckwourth.

Beckwourth was one of the most famous Indian fighters of his time having fought in the Mexican and Cheyenne wars.

Beckwourth, a guide, Indian fighter, hunter and the teller of tall tales led many expeditions of settlers through the Rockies.

He was made chief of the Crow Indians tribe after he had lived with them for six years. He had also lived with the Blackfeet Indians. He knew customs and could speak the language of three tribes. The Indians called him "Morning Star."

A female female slave once sold for $100 staged the first "sit-in" years before Martin Luther King, Jr. Sojourner Truth sat at the office of President Abraham Lincoln to suggest ways of handling freed, unemployed slaves.

Sojourner Truth, a native of New York, also rode on horse drawn street cars in Washington, until she was forcefully removed. Later, she sued the company and was awarded damages for the incident.

Known as "The Black Joan of Arc," Truth was a fierce anti-slavery speaker despite her little schooling.

She claimed to have had a mystical experience in which God called her "Sojourner Truth" and commanded her to go forth to declare the truth to all men.

S. African women continue to struggle

By KIMBERLY A. BURGE
Collegian Staff

Black women remain the most oppressed and exploited people of the Black race in South Africa, according to the secretary of the New York chapter of the African National Congress (ANC), who spoke at the University of Massachusetts Sunday.

Nomazizi Sokudela was the keynote speaker at a forum entitled, "The Current South African National Liberation Struggle & the Role of Women."

The forum began with the showing of the videotape "Last Drop of Blood" which depicted Black South Africa's fight against the racist, fascist government of South Africa.

Sokudela then discussed the roles women have played. She told stories of how women have been harassed, banished, banned, and tortured.

Children aren't even safe from the government regime, Sokudela said. "Babies and pre-school children are mowed down by the regime because according to them, they are future terrorists."

Sokudela was very impressed with Americans protesting against South Africa's racist government. "It's making an impact and I call upon America to continue its beautiful record," she said.

She had only bad comments to make about Reagan's involvement with the South African government. "Constructive agreement has helped South Africa take a 20 year step backward." She added Reagan came out and openly embraced the apartheid, fascist regime of Pretoria.

Divestment was another issue discussed at the lecture. No black person in South Africa can talk about divestment because it's considered high treason and carries a heavy penalty. "Divestment and withdrawal are very much connected to South Africa's very survival," Sokudela stated.

She is appealing to women's organizations, labor unions, and student movements to intensify efforts to support U.S. sanctions against South Africa. "When the United States applies sanctions, they work. The worked against Nicaragua and Poland, why not South Africa?

The forum concluded with Miss Sokudela saluting the countries of El Salvador, Nicaragua, Palestine, and the Western Sahara for fighting against fascist governments and told students "Not to forget history of being seen and counted."

Magazine theme comes under fire

By PAULA DUVAL
Collegian Correspondent

"The Third World and a New World: Color in the Gaps," this year's theme of the University of Massachusetts literary Magazine, Spectrum has come under fire as being "too confusing" and "unclear" by UMass students.

Monique Vasquez, Spectrum's new managing editor said she is not surprised by such comments and said she is actually glad these critisisms have arisen because they "justify the theme."

"It is hard for someone to make a statement on an issue they don't really understand...They're a little scared," Vasquez said.

Vasquez, added that issues about and or affecting the Third World are important among politicians, and while superstars are not doing anything about it, artists should be.

According to board members, the topic for this year's issue was discussed before media attention was focused on the drought-induced famine in Ethiopia and racial problems in South Africa were part of the American television scene.

"It is a topic that involves everyone-White, blacks, educated and uneducated people," Vasquez said adding, solutions are possible, changes are needed, and yet nothing is being done."

She hopes the theme accomplishes "possible solutions or alternatives for the Third World."

Libby Hubbard, a Spectrum member, hopes the theme makes people more humane towards the problems hampering the Third World. "Cultural revolution must coincide with political revolution," she said.

"As a Third World person, the theme creates an aura of optimism not presently seen in any other media publication," said prose editor, Yadira Betances.

"The plight of the Third World is not an overnight phenomenon, but centuries of colonization and imperialism by the United States and other European countries and by having word of hope it threatens the dominant force," she said. "But change is on the way."

Charles Francis Carol, former managing editor hopes the theme encourages non-Whites students to submit to the magazine. He said Spectrum "has not done enough to welcome others (thus) failing to be a spectrum."

Spectrum has also gone through a change in leadership. Six of their eleven editors are women, including a Third World woman. "We are a spectrum of people trying to be a spectrum," Vasquez said.

The editors said all journals of art, prose, and poetry will be accepted. The magazine will have 16 color pages, with 68 pages overall.

They added writers and artists can be as creative as they want to in expanding the topic to cover Third World countries, the Third World in the United States or the bridging of the age and cultural gap.

State officials lash out at White House plan

)STON (AP)—Denouncing proposed cuts in revenue aring, student loans and other domestic spending, state d local officials across Massachusetts are vowing to ;ht President Reagan's federal budget proposals.

When Reagan's plans became known yesterday, assachusetts Democrats howled over a loss of federal l to the state and its 351 cities and towns, estimated at 75 million.

"Federal revenue sharing has been essential to assachusetts cities and towns—especially since Proposi-n 2½," said James Segel of the Massachusetts unicipal Association.

"We're hoping this gets put back in, but Congress is very serious about cutting the budget," Segel said. Massachusetts will lose $129 million in direct aid to municipalities, he said.

Gov. Michael S. Dukakis and members of his administration attacked the proposed cuts and said they were perplexed by statements attributed to U.S. Rep. Chester Atkins, D-Mass.

Atkins, member of the House Budget Committee, was quoted as saying that "it makes no sense" to continue revenue sharing at a time when many states have surpluses and the U.S. government has a large deficit.

"I read that as saying the states ought to raise taxes," Finance Secretary Frank Keefe said. "I don't think that's a very responsible position for any Massachusetts official to take.

"If disaster happens—elimination of general revenue sharing—then we're going to have to respond," Keefe said.

Dukakis, a consistent Reagan critic, was openly furious.

"I think the budget is a travesty," he said.

"It's the states which, over the past several years, have been making the hard budget decisions. No one knows that better than I," said Dukakis, who put through the largest tax increase in state history in the late 1970s and subsequently lost the governorship.

Minuteman hoop coaches hit the road

Recruiting season open

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

"The important thing to remember about recruiting," University of Massachusetts assistant basketball coach Kennis Jackson says, "Is that we don't eliminate players, they eliminate us. It's a big game, and one you have to win."

You can pull a team up to a national championship with a good recruiting job, or watch a program go down to the bottom depending on how well today's high school seniors play in five years.

UMass has six spots open on next year's roster, a high amount since most teams like to keep an equal amount of freshmen, sophomores, juniors and seniors.

Horace Neysmith, Bobby Braun, Donald Russell, Ron Young and George Ramming are graduating, Tom Swick, a freshman, transfered to Niagara leaving the other spot open. Russell, Braun and Neysmith all start and will leave close to 50 points and 25 rebounds a game for others to make up.

Already in the fold for next season are a 6-8 redshirt freshman Fitzhugh Tarry, 6-9 transfer (from Iona) John Milum and 6-5 swingman Kavid Brown from Baltimore's Cardinal Gibbons High, one of the nation's top prep teams.

The other spots are still open, with the UMass staff actively pursuing several players.

High among those are two forwards from Philadelphia's Ben Franklin High, 6-8 Bill Bolds and 6-7 George Reed. The duo, who may come as a package, are also being chased by Marquette and Atlantic 10 rival St. Bonaventure.

Terry Dozier (6-9) and Perry Dozier (6-10) are two other highly-sought seniors. Both are from Dunbar High in Baltimore with Terry a Street and Smith Magazine All-America selection.

Local recruits include John Smiley, a 6-7 forward from Springfield and Southwick's Jason Lebo, a 6-10 center.

Priorities for UMass, with the return of point guard Carl Smith, the 6-2 Lorenzo Sutton (now a forward, but a natural guard) and Matt Ryan (a natural shooting guard), are forwards and centers.

The Minutemen haven't had a real (6-10 and above) center in five years. With Temple, St. Bonaventure and other league schools landing seven-footers, the need is paramount.

But being seven feet tall isn't a free ticket into college.

"We're looking for players first, not just tall kids," Jackson said. "I'd rather have a 6-5 kid who can play instead of a 7-1 kid who can't move. Of course, we'd take the big guy who can play over the little guy, but it's hard to find them."

Gerlufsen and Jackson spoke of UM possibly looking for junior college players to keep a favorable balance.

One player that is a possibility is 6-8 Dante Woods, a 230 pounder playing in Kansas.

"Obviously we'd like to get some older players who can pick up the scoring slack, since we're losing so much and freshmen often have trouble scoring," Jackson said.

The other returning Minutemen include only two forwards, Tom Emerson and Wilbert Hicks. Darryl Carter and Jackie Sheehan are natural guards. The big man is the need.

"Out there somewhere is the right kid who can play and wants to come here, with a little selling," Jackson said. "It's just a matter of finding him."

Women face Green

Look for 10th

By JOHN A. NOLAN
Collegian Staff

Hoping to extend their current three game winning streak, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team travels to Hanover, N.H. to battle the Big Green of Dartmouth College tonight at 7:30 p.m.

"This would be an important win for us in terms of our status in New England," said head coach Barbara Stevens. "This would put us in a position of bettering last years output of victories (10)."

The Big Green are expected to give the Minutewomen, 9-10, a tough game behind the talents of a tall front line at 6-0, 6-1 and 6-2. Dartmouth is led by junior forward Jayne Daigle averaging 20 points-per-game while hauling in 11 rebounds per game.

"She's pretty much their whole team," Stevens said. "We're hoping to use our overall team quickness in order to compensate for their greater height."

"As a team, I would expect us to try and improve on our (37 percent) shooting percentage. That's not going to win us too many games."

Another key to winning may be Tara Lewis. The 5-8 forward has averaged 11.3 ppg over the last three games in helping out with the team's resurgence from their five game losing streak during wintersession.

"She's gained a lot of confidence," Stevens said. "She's now beginning to show her abilities."

"The team understands what it must do in order to keep on winning. I would expect them to give us a pretty good game."

UMass Gymnastics teams suffer disappointing losses in weekend competition

By ANNE TAUGER
Collegian Correspondent

Though the University of Massachusetts Women's Gymnastics team lost Saturday against Cornell, 167.5 to 160 at Boyden Gym, the meet proved to be a very satisfying one, particularly for senior captain Jennifer Pancoast.

"It was the first time in her college career that Pancoast performed a "tsukahara" in vaulting competition (a hand spring onto the horse followed by a flip off the horse).

"Vaulting was a thrill. I was very happy with my performance and the team's performance overall. The only reason we lost was because Cornell was a better team," Pancoast said.

Other team members also showed great improvement in their performances at the home meet, especially sophomore Tricia Camus.

"Tricia competed all-around for the first time this year. She handled the pressure very well. She has become more positive about herself and her routines," Shiebler said.

Division Two powerhouse East Stroudsberg handed the men's Gymnastics team their second loss of the season with a 262.2-253.05 victory at East Stroudsberg, Pennsylvania.

Last year's Division II national champions won five of the six events, with the Minutemen taking only the still rings. Dave Sherman was the top UMass performer in that event with a 9.0

Senior co-captain Ken Dougherty posted the highest score of the meet for UMass with a 9.15 on the pommell horse.

"They were definitely by far the better team. If we had had a good day, we might have come close to their bad day," coach Roy Johnson said.

The Minutemen travel today to New Haven, Connecticut to face Southern Connecticut.

Feinberg stars for women

Swimmers batter Rams, 81-58

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

Senior Liz Feinberg set two school records on way to winning four events to lift the University of Massachusetts women's swim team to an 81-58 victory over the University of Rhode Island Friday at Boyden.

Feinberg set school records in the 200 freestyle (1:57.37) and 500 freestyle (5:18.48) and won the 50 free in 25.46. She also anchored the 200 medley relay team to a 2:01.49 and the victory. Julie Wilkins, Shauna Riley and Maura Skelley also swam the relay win.

Other wins for the 2-7 Minutewomen came from Nan Stephens in the 1,000 at 11:42.14, Wilkins in the 100 backstroke in 1:07.36, Skelley took the 100 butterfly in 1:05.35 and Lori McCluskey in the 100 freestlye at 57.70.

Wilkins also won the 200 backstroke in 2:25.62 and Ellen O'Brien was a 2:25.99 victor in the 200 butterfly

The 400 IM saw Skelley win in 4:58.27. Another good effort came from Sue Freitas who qualified for the New Englands in the 400 IM (5:04.51), in the 200 freestyle (2:06.27) and in the 100 butterfly (1:05.35 in an unofficial heat).

Stephanie Meyer had a 2:44.24 in the 200 fly, and Stephens qualified with a 5:10.76 in the 400 IM.

Feinberg is at least two seconds better than anyone else in New England in the 200 and according to coach Bob Newcomb said that she should win the championship.

She is undefeated in the freestyles this season through nine meets.

"We picked the best time of the season to come on," Newcomb said. "We've had some great swims from many of the women and looking toward the New Englands I expect some good times."

WOMEN AND SEXISM IN APARTHEID

by Segun Eubanks
Nummo Staff

Racism and sexism run hand in hand in the South African Apartheid regime. So also do Black men and women fight hand and hand in South Africa for equality and control of their rightful homeland. Thus is the view of the African National Congress (ANC) as exemplified in a presentation Sunday evening in the Campus Center by Nomazizi Sukudela, Secretary of the ANC Regional Political Committee.

Sukedela, a native South African currently exiled in the United States for attempted political organization, presented a lecture and discussion in conjunction with the showing of the video "Last Drop of Blood" on the issues of the Current South African National Liberation Struggle and the role of women. "Sexist inequality comes from the racist South African regime" said Sukudela, pointing out that Black men and women must identify the true enemy, "dividing the struggle (between sexism and racism) would be self-defeating.

Contrary to the Reagan Administration reports, the situation in South Africa is not getting any better, according to Sukudela. "Babies are mowed down in South Africa because according to the government they are future terrorists." In spite of the fact that South Africa is one of the richest countries in the world mass starvation is still blamed on the drought. As Sukadela pointed out, in some rural areas children are dying at a rate of six per hour from starvation, disease and murder.

Sukadela urged American citizens to keep fighting against the South African government. She attacked a study done by the Reagan administration which claimed that Black South Africans did not want U.S. companies to leave the country. If a Black person speaks in favor of divestment they will be charged with high treason said Sukudela. She supported struggles for divestment as a legitimate means of destabilizing the South African economy. Trade sanctions worked against Nicaragua and Poland, why not South Africa she questioned. The A.N.C. has supportedarmed struggle against the South African regime and will continue according to Sukadela.

Many leaders of nations, including ours, state the Soviet Union has completely controlled the A.N.C. since its existence. That, says Sukudela, is not possible. The A.N.C. began in 1912, five years previous to the Russian revolution.

It is true that the Soviet Union supplies arms to the Blacks of South Africa, you see, said Sukudela, "we will accept arms from anyone willing to give them to us. "contructive enganement" has not worked in 400 years we do not believe it will work, said Sukudela.

"We are not a violent people, our struggle has always been one of peaceful intentions it was the white racist regime who shed the first drop of blood," she continued "now we will fight to the last drop of our blood."

The South African Government said recently, that it would partially suspend the forced resettlement of black communities to tribal homelands, away from South Africa's white population.

The announcement capped a week of unusual government proclamations on its racial separation policies: a week in which President P.W. Botha offered terms for the release of imprisoned Black leader Nelson Mandewla - an offer spurned by Mandela's family and South Africa's new, three chamber segregated Parliament.

Botha's National Party, which has controlled the white-minority Government since 1948, said it was offering the Nation's 22 million Blacks a new deal.

Under South African law Blacks are considered citizens of 10 homelands, and have political rights only in those areas. Gerrit Viljoen, minister of Cooperation Development and educatin said the Government will review the planned resettlement of hundreds of thousands of Blacks who are to be moved to tribal homelands from land exbropriated whites.

The practical effect of the review remained unclear because the Government often is accused of appointing Black leaders who go along with the government's wishes and lack support from the people.

Viljoen said, the three major changes which are being made in South Africa are - 1. Residents of 25 to 30 urban Black townships and 30 to 35 rural areas, who were to have been moved to tribal homelands from designated white areas will be allowed to remain at least temporarily, while each community situation is reviewed. 2. The strict controls on Blacks working and living in the countries urban areas will be eased gradually and supplanted by a program of "orderly urbanization" that will allow Blacks to move to the cities if job opportunities and adequate housing are available. 3. Some of the Blacks who have moved into Shantyowns on the outskirts of such cities as Cape Town in defiance of present requlations will be offered sites on the outskirts of new black housing areas on which they may build.

The main reasons for the policy changes were the fast growth of the black communities that were to be resettled, the mounting opposition from them to resettlement and the criticism of the program at home and abroad, the minister said. The biggest factor in persuading the government of the need for change, he added, was the "strong and persistent arguments" of Black township officials and homeland leaders for an end to forced resettlements, easier urban migration and freehold property rights for blacks.

Botha offered to release Mandela if he renounces the use of violence. Mandela, 66. a former policeman, prize-fighter and lawyer, is imprisoned near Cape Town and could not respond publicy to the offer. The leader of the outlawed African National Congress, has served 20 years of a life term for sabotage.

Nummo News would like to welcome Professor David DuBois back to the valley. We look forward to working with and learning from Mr. DuBois who is a visiting 5-College professor.

AUGUSTA SAVAGE REMEMBERED

On Sunday, February 10, 1985, from 3 to 8 p.m., the Augusta Savage Memorial Gallery in New Africa House will be rededicated in honor of Ms. Savage, the eminent Black sculptress after whom the gallery is named. Ms. Murcie Poplar Lavender, who was the only private student Ms. Savage chose to instruct during her long career and who is now an art teacher in the Gary, IN. public school system, will be the guest speaker. In addition to speaking about Ms. Savage as a person and creative artist, Ms. Lavender will exhibit several sculpture pieces by Ms. Savage and photographs of other works. This will be the first time since the gallery was established that the campus community will have an opportunity to view any of these works. Ms. Lavender will also exhibit examples of her own work. The rededication ceremony will also include a blessing and libation by Professor Dovi Afesi and a dance performance by Ms. Patti O'Neal.

Augusta Christine Savage sculptor, educator and art center director, was born in Green Cove Springs, Florida. She died on March 27, 1962. She studied at Tallahassee State Normal School, Cooper Union (New York City),Grande Chaumiere (Paris), Academy of Fine Arts (Rome), and the Woman's Art School (New York City). Her works have been exhibited in numerous galleries , including the Harmon Foundation, Architecture League, National Association of Women Painters, Harlem YMCA, Societe Des Artistes Francais, Paris, Schomburg Library, New York, and South Side Community Art Center, Chicago. Among the collections in which her works are included are Morgan State University, the National Archives, and the Schomburg Collection, in addition to numerous private collections.

During her career Ms. Savage was the recipient of awards from the Julius Rosenwald Fund, and the Camegie Fund. She was also the first Black woman to be accepted as a member of the National Association of Woman Painters and Sculptors. Her major work includes 'The Harp', 'Gamin', 'Black Woman', 'Prima Donna' and 'Lift Every Voice ", a sculpture group which was inspired by the Black writer and poet James Weldon Johnson's poem 'Lift Every Voice and Sing', set to music by his brother Rosamund and generally referred to as the 'Negro National Anthem'. This sculpture group was exhibited prominently at the 1938 New York World Fair.

MURCIE POPLAR LAVENDER

Ms. Lavender, who resides in Gary,Indiana, is a painter, sculptor, writer, designer, children's book illustrator, and teacher.

At the age of seven she was awarded the first of several arts scholarships to study at the Art Institute of Chicago. After graduation from Roosevelt High School in Gary, where she recieved that school's first art scholarship, she received Bachelor's and Master's degrees in art from Indiana University, where she also was the first student to receive a scholarship from the University's art honorary society. While a college student she recieved a gift of a 2,200 pound piece of Indiana limestone from which she sculpted an 8 faced work entitled "Steel Workers" as a monument and gift to the men who worked in the Gary steel mills. This work, which depicts the various ethnic groups of the city, was unvieled by the mayor of Gary and stands in a small park opposite the main gate of the mill. Later, Ms. Lavender lived and studied with Augusta Savage in upstate New York for 12 years.

In addition to teaching art in the Gary school system, Ms. Lavender is a member of the Greater Gary Arts Council Board, which promotes and sponsors cultural activities for the city. With this organization she established the Gary Art Institute and Children's Art Institute, and helped initiate the city's first International Folk and Art Festival.

Ms. Lavender has also been an illustrator for "Letter Magazine" and several children's books, and has designed a commemorative candle for the late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. For further information call 545-0932 or stop by the Gallery.

EDITORIAL

Black History Month should be a time when African people look back to the past to see where we have come from and to look into the future of the rapidly approaching twenty first century. Without this basic principle it is not adequate to present films,discussions and lectures on Frederick Douglas, the now crippled Civil Rights Movement and on intergration. In order for history to assist us in our struggle today there has to be some sort of analysis from an African perspective in an attempt to relate the past to present conditions.

During this period it is not enough to know that it was the Ancient Africans, now called Egyptians, who built the pyramids. Those of us who are pursuing careers in engineering or the natural sciences should attempt to build some pyramids in the Harlems of the world. However, what do most of us do? We try to brag and boast to the world about working for a business or corporation that rapes and sucks the blood of African people and her resources.

With a clear understanding of history we will instantaneously see that this behavior we are engaging in, is insane and morally incorrect.

Furthermore, Black History Month should give us the insperation to be self-reliant again. In 1985 we can no longer sit back and beg for crumbs; it is now the time for positive planning and meaningful action. As Booker T. Washington said,"cast down your buckets where you are".

February is Black History Month. During this month, which is 'coincidently' the shortest of the calender year, African-Americans are supposed to tell their entire history - an almost impossible feat. Unfortunately, many people who have taken the responsibility for presenting our history have done so without its contemporary relavence. Thus, by presenting our history in this vacum mode it will inhibit us from liberating our minds. However, there are some Africans who do the contrary. Two that come to mind are Dr's John Henrick Clake and Yosef ben-Jochannan. Having been influenced by these two great men has promoted me to discuss what Black History Month should be.

Black History Month should provide a direction that African people can go in! This direction should contain the following: Community,Respect,Love and Self-reliance.

New fee unfair according to SGA

By JOHN YONCE
Collegian Staff

The proposed creation of a new fee at the University of Massachusetts will result in off-campus students helping to pay the debt service on buildings used only by on-campus students.

A percentage of all student fees is currently used to pay debt service (which repays bond holders who have lent money to the University for building construction and maintenance buildings) in five categories. Two of those fees, for dining commons and residence halls, are charged only to those who use them; the other three fees, transit, athletics and Campus Center, are charged to all students.

"Basically, people who go off-campus are doing it by choice and are not disenfranchised" — H.J. Littefield, associate vice-chancellor for administration and finance.

The Board of Trustees has already approved the consolidation of the fees into one Authority Fee, a clarification of the Universal Resource Fee, Student Government Association co-President Rick Patrick said. John L. DeNyse, vice-chancellor for administration and finance, has proposed that the fee be structured so it is levied equally to all students regardless of residence.

The proposed fee is "inequitable" Patrick said, because graduate, greek, and off-campus students would be required to pay the fee.

H.J. Littlefield, associate vice chancellor for administration and finance, outlined the proposal before the SGA Rents and Fees Committee last night.

"I don't believe that we would be a 25,000 student body without the housing system and the boarding system," Littlefield said. "We have to maintain that system (of residence halls) and encourage the 3,000 (students eligible to move off-campus who don't) to stay," he said. Littlefield said that the fees to the on-campus student would benefit all students.

The proposal would charge each student an Authority fee of $261 per semester at first, he said. This would result in on-campus graduates paying $74 less in fees, and the off-campus undergraduates paying $171 more, Littlefield said.

"I'm not going to sit here and tell you no one's going to get hurt," Littlefield said students who would really be affected would be late transfer students and other students who never live on-campus or participate in the board plan.

"Basically, people who go off-campus are doing it by choice and are not disenfranchised," he said.

Littlefield said students would receive an "indirect benefit" because of less competition for off-campus housing as costs force more students to remain on-campus.

The proposal will be brought to the Board of Trustees meeting April 3, Patrick said.

Concert funds reduced sharply for spring

By DAVID SUMMERSBY
Collegian Staff

A joint request of $34,500 was agreed upon by five student groups last night as the bare minimum of funds needed from the student government to ensure the survival of the Spring Concert Series at the University of Massachusetts this year.

Although that figure is $20,000 less than what they had originally requested, the participants were forced to make concessions through an informal bargaining process, since it was revealed that the Student Government Association (SGA) can only provide about $29,000 from its budget towards the concerts.

The agreement was made at a special spring concert finance meeting called by SGA Treasurer John Mooradian where he announced what his office could provide and then heard budget requests from the cooordinators of the five concerts. The groups involved, who will also ask the Graduate Student Senate for money, include the Union Program Council (UPC), the Southwest Area Government (SWAG), East Side Concert, the UMass Theatre Guild, a Greek area organization and Orchard Hill residents.

Mooradian, who will propose that the SGA grant the money tonight at the SGA's weekly meeting, said he was "pleased and a little surprised" the agreement was made so easily and that he is confident the money request will be given. However, he said, if the request is rejected, some shows may be cancelled, leading to squabbles over which shows are more important.

Most people at the meeting agreed that the scarcity of funds and rising costs are lowering the quality of the concerts from year to year and may even threaten the continued existence of spring concerts at UMass.

Under the new agreement, UPC is requesting $18,000 for their concerts a decrease from $40,000 allotted last year and the $23,000 they asked for at the beginning of last night's meeting.

All the groups were forced to decrease their requests significantly and as a result, "We will put on a concert but many people will not be happy with the quality in talent we get," Foley said.

Although no bands have been announced for the Pond Series, Foley said the money they get from the SGA plus their own revenue may only be sufficient to produce a headlining act like The Stompers or David Johnnson, who have both played at UMass before.

Grad Senate says fee biased

By SEAN CASEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Graduate Student Senate passed last night a resolution condemning the proposed creation of a Universal Resource Fee, which the senate said is "grossly unfair to all students who live off campus."

"The senate is outraged by this proposal and we feel that ultimately it will affect the quality and quantity of the applicants to the University and therefore affect the quality of education here," Sanjiv Dugal, President of the senate said.

The Universal Resource Fee plan calls for the combining of all debt service fees, the fees students pay to finance the bonds used to build the Campus Center, the dining commons, dormitories and other campus buildings.

Dugal explained that, without the Universal Resource Fee, monies from the trust fund of one building could not be used to fund any project in another building, and this could result in one trust fund's receiving a surplus while other funds do not create enough for renovations.

While Dugal said the cost benefit of the plan is obvious, two separate fees could be charged, and this could avert off-campus students' having to pay into the trust funds for dormitories and dining commons, he said.

"For graduate students in particular, the plan would be unfair," Dugal said. "Our current Campus Center Fee of $84 would be increased to $261, a jump of over 300 percent, and since the University already has a hard time attracting graduate students because of our low stipends for assistantships, the senate feels the plan would adversely affect the University in the long run," Dugal added.

Students applaud movie

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

When Jeff decided to tell his parents he was gay, they sent him to see a psychiatrist. When he then told them, after a few sessions, that therapy would not change his sexual orientation, an emotional argument ensued, ending with his father's threatening to cut off all financial support.

Such was the experience of one college student who decided to stop "pretending" he was straight and announce to the world that he was not--in the network television premiere of Consenting Adult Monday night. That scenario, say members of the People's Gay Alliance at the University of Massachusetts, was realistic, even if the film failed to mention the gay and lesbian community and dealt more with the parents' strife than Jeff's.

"I thought it was fantastic," PGA's Michael Cerrato said. "I came this close to crying. It pictured what happened in my home. The first time I told my parents, all hell broke loose. My father said the exact same thing (as the gay son's father did) to me. 'Do what you want, but I'm not paying for it,' my father said. It was very realistic."

In the second half of the movie, Jeff moves in with his lover and finds two jobs to finance the rest of his education. Jeff's father dies before sending him a letter that would have re-opened communication with him; it takes Jeff's mother more time to learn to "share in," her son's lifestyle. But she does.

"It was exactly how my family reacted," Cerrato said, "except my mother isn't so accepting (as in the movie.)"

"The movie was very traumatic for everyone," said Kathleen Offenhartz. "It was realistic for some families but not for others. It didn't show the fact that the fellow was happy as a gay," or mention the gay community or lesbians, she said.

"It was really a story of the mother dealing with it," Paul Throne said. "It wasn't the story of a gay child."

Cerrato defended the movie saying, "The movie wasn't meant to portray the trauma of a gay child but the family. I thought it did a fine job."

"The best part," Tony Hanson said, "was at the end when the mother realized that if she kept putting off (getting close to her son again) maybe she'll be gone, like her husband before she could be close again. This movie helped parents."

WORLD AND NATIONAL NEWS

U.S.Navy officer uncovers extraordinary Soviet mutiny story

WASHINGTON (AP) — In the pre-dawn darkness of Nov. 8, 1975, the Soviet missile frigate Storozhevoy quietly slipped its lines and headed out to sea from the Russian port of Riga.

For hours, according to an unclassified summary, no one in the Russian navy knew the ship was gone.

So began one of the most extraordinary, although ultimately unsuccessful, mutinies in the history of modern sailing—new details of which have just been published. Before the incident was over, this account states, the Storozhevoy would move well out into the Baltic Sea on a mad dash toward Sweden and freedom in the West, only to be turned back by attacking Soviet planes and other ships.

At least a dozen sailors were killed during the incident, the summary adds, and the leader of the mutiny was later tried and shot. After a final cruise in the Baltic, the Storozhevoy was transferred to the Soviet Pacific Fleet.

The attempted flight of the Storozhevoy has been reported in the past by U.S. and European newspapers, but never acknowledged by the Soviet Union. Now, however, thanks to the investigative work of a U.S. Navy officer, a much more complete account of the incident has emerged.

It paints a picture of harsh living conditions on board the ship; of a young, trusted political officer and an unusual series of events that allowed the officer to take charge of a front-line warship—with most of its crew ashore—in a port close to international waters and the West.

The detective work was performed by Lt. Cmdr. Gregory D. Young, who earned a master's degree from the Naval Postgraduate School in 1982 by devoting his thesis to the Storozhevoy incident. His findings attracted little interest, however, until they were summarized this month in the magazine Sea Power.

The Navy refuses to comment formally on Young's research, although sources say it has been accepted as the most definitive account available. The Navy also was willing to put a reporter in contact with Young after determining his work had not been classified. Now an instructor with the Navy ROTC program at the University of Colorado, Young said recently he had received access to some classified materials on the mutiny.

"But frankly, they weren't much help," Young said, adding he pieced together most of the information from other sources, including Russian immigrants who were in Riga and intercepted radio messages.

"There is no doubt the incident occurred," Young said.

According to Young, the mutiny on board the Storozhevoy was led by the ship's zampolit, or political deputy, an officer placed aboard every Soviet ship to maintain the ideological purity of the crew. The zampolit on the Storozhevoy, a modern 3,800-ton warship that was only three years old in 1975, was Capt. Valery Mikhaylovich Sablin.

Photographs of missing kids to be placed on soda bottles

PITTSBURGH (AP) — A soft drink bottler is adding its resources to a growing campaign to find missing children.

Abarta Inc. of Pittsburgh, which bottles Coca-Cola and other soft drinks in Bethlehem, Pa., Cleveland, and Buffalo, N.Y., is placing photographs and descriptions of missing children on pop bottles distributed in those cities.

Three sizes of pop bottles wearing paper aprons carrying the information will appear on store shelves beginning Wednesday.

Abarta president John Bitzer said the idea came from a Chicago public relations firm. Several Midwestern milk producers are picturing missing children on milk containers and the Chicago Transit Authority is publicizing the children on buses and commuter trains.

"We'll do it as long as it's needed and we're doing any kind of good," Bitzer said. "The epidemic of missing children is such an immense moral issue at this point that all of us are compelled to become involved."

The company will feature a new group of missing children on 500,000 bottles every three weeks, he said.

Each paper strip describes a missing child from Pennsylvania, Ohio or New York. It asks readers with information to call a toll-free telephone number.

The information is supplied by the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children in Washington, D.C.

Bitzer said he hoped other Coca-Cola bottlers and other competitors would join the effort.

Coca-Cola USA had no immediate comment.

Girl shot in Dorchester, mother nabs assailant

BOSTON (AP) - A 14-year-old boy has been arrested after a city jail guard whose daughter was shot in a robbery attempt said she overheard the youth tell a companion on a subway train, "I pumped a broad in Dorchester last night."

"I couldn't believe it. My ears shot up. I thought I had rabbit ears," said Frances James, 55, who had just left her daughter, Mary Frances James, at Boston City Hospital last Friday when she heard the chance remark.

The youth, who was not identified because of his age, was arraigned Monday in Dorchester District Court on charges of juvenile delinquency by reason of attempted murder, accourding to a court clerk who refused to give his name.

The coincidence began last Thursday when Miss James, a 21 year old restaurant supervisor at the westin Hotel, cashed a check and got on a bus headed to her home in the Dorchester section of Boston.

As she fumbled in her purse for change, she spilled a few hundred dollars, said Boston Police spokesman Peter Woloschuk.

After she got off the bus, a youth who had been sitting next to her came up from behind and demanded her purse. A brief struggle followed.

The youth shot her in the back, but as doctors readied her for surgery at Boston City Hospital, the bullet fell out. It had just grazed her skin after passing through three sweaters and a fur coat.

After visiting her daughter the next day, Mrs. James, who works as a guard at the Charles Street Jail, boarded a Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority train while a friend drove Miss James home.

"I just happened to sit down next to these guys and I heard one say, 'I pumped a broad in Dorchester last night because she wouldn't turn loose her bag,'" Mrs. James recalled Tuesday.

She said the suspect said he shot her daughter because she "had a big wad of money. He said he wanted that wad."

"I could have killed him. All I could think of was, 'How dare you shoot my daughter,'" said Mrs. James, the mother of 11. "I guess I know how that guy on the train in New York felt.

She followed the youth off the train, out to Boston's downtown shopping center and into a restaurant, where she called police.

The youth disappeared shortly after two police officers arrived, but Mrs. James soon found him in a street search and police arrested him.

"He's got a record a mile long and he's only 14," she said of the youth. "And there he was talking about shooting my daughter right there on the train. Right next to me. Now, that's incredible, isn't it?"

Professor resigns amid harassment charges

CAMBRIDGE (AP) - A Harvard University professor has resigned from his tenured position in the government department amid allegations that he sexually harassed a female student at another college two years ago.

Douglas A. Hibbs Jr., a specialist in political economics, will take a medical leave of absence and then resign at the end of the leave, University officials said in a statement released Monday night. School officials would not say how long the leave would last.

University spokesman David M. Rosen said the resignation followed a sexual harassment complaint filed against Hibbs last December.

Rosen would not discuss details of the complaint. However, The Harvard Crimson reported Tuesday that the complaint was filed by a student at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in May 1983, where Hibbs has worked in the past while teaching at Harvard.

Hibbs, 40, was not available for comment Tuesday.

Hibbs is the third professor in the Harvard government department in recent years to be the subject of a sexual harassment complaint.

The other two men were disciplined, although the University refused to comment on their cases publically.

Asked whether Hibbs is the first professor to leave the school following a sexual harassment complaint, Rosen said, "I can't comment on that, and in fact I don't know."

The MIT student, Hibbs and Harvard officials have agreed to a legal contract not to discuss the case with the media, The Crimson reported. Also agreeing not to discuss the case was a former female faculty member, whose connection with the case was not clear.

Mass. hires less blacks than average

BOSTON (AP) The percentage of blacks on Massachusetts state college faculties was lower than the national average last year, although it was slightly higher than the average at private colleges in the Boston area, according to state figures.

Affirmative action experts attributed the difference in the number of blacks at private versus public schools to the greater sensitivity of publicly financed institutions to political pressure.

According to figures released by the State Office of Affirmative Action, the hiring of black teachers at Massachusetts public colleges has improved since Gov. Michael S. Dukakis took office in 1983.

"I've always been looking for the specific answer why we don't have more black faculty," said BruceRose, affirmative action director for the state Board of Regents. "The Board of Regents does not have personnel authority over the campuses. without that, it's a little difficult to get leverage.

Rose, who noted that the board discussed the issue last December and is scheduled to take up the matter again Feb. 12, is optimistic about further progress.

As of July 30, 1984, five of the 28 state schools had no black teachers. Those schools were Framingham State College, Middlesex Community College, Greenfield Community College, Quinsigamond Community College and Massachusetts Maritime Academy.

The three state schools with the best hiring records have sizable enrollments of minority students. Those schools are Roxbury Community College with 38 percent black faculty; Hunker Hill Community College, with 7.6 percent; and the University of Massachusetts-Boston, with 6.8 percent.

Affirmative action specialists say community colleges usually have better records in hiring blacks because there is a larger pool of applicants with the required master's degree, rather than the doctorates needed at universities.

The University of Massachusetts at Amherst has the largest number of black teachers-34-but their proportion of 1,191 was only 2.9 percent.

According to the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, 4.4 percent of state schools in the country employ black faculty members.

Several schools throughout Massachusetts, public and private, have set up special funds to provide salaries for academic departments that have recruited minorities but have no job openings.

First state woman officer leads Sensitive Crimes Unit at UM

Women on Campus

By SUE EATON
Collegian Correspondent

The first woman to be appointed as a police officer in Massachusetts 15 years ago says she was reluctant at first to become a staff sergeant at the University of Massachusetts Department of Safety.

Mary Dumas, who is also a member of the sensitive crime unit, said that taking on the role as the director of community relations and staff development as staff sergeant would mean being forced into a "stereotypical role as an administrator rather than a police officer."

But during the past 12 years as staff sergeant, Dumas said she has warmed to the role because, "I meet with decision makers from a wide range of committees on campus and can therefore influence decisions much better."

Dumas said she encountered reactions of shock and surprise when she applied for a patrol officer position. At that time, the state only hired "police women who were relegated to desk jobs with little change of upward mobility."

In August 1970, when the hiring practices changed, Dumas reapplied and later became the first woman patrol sergeant in Massachusetts.

The Sensitive Crimes Unit, founded in 1971, deals with sexual harassment and violence against women. "Because it was apparent that support mechanisms were available in the community for offenders, this made for a considerable imbalance when there were no support mechanism for victims," Dumas said.

The unit, which is comprised of 20 members including staff psychologists and 13 officers trained in counseling, work to prepare and present court evidence against offenders. The staff also compiles offender profiles.

Dumas said she is "pleased with the number of men who eagerly sought admittance into the unit and who are constantly trying to upgrade their skills."

"A most appropriate response to a victim who has been hurt by a man is to have a sensitive man work with them in taking constructive action against what happened and thus validating that what happened was wrong," she said.

Dumas is currently working with the Massachusetts Criminal Justice Council and the International Association of Women Police on a presentation that will link pornography to violence against women, for police officers.

"Pornography is so prevalent in our society, and it is increasingly violent pornography that depicts violence and abuse of women. With this volume of it and an increased presence of it in our homes, we are sending messages that this is ok behavior," she said.

Dumas added that there is new research that links pornography with rape statistics. Police can't be uninformed. We're trying to bring as much information to bear as possible," she said.

Dumas said the increasing number of recruits entering the police force is a result of better role identification through the media and developed self-confidence.

"When I entered the field, we as women didn't have the motivation that young women have now. Through 1970 and 1980, women proved themselves. It used to be that any mistake a woman made as an officer would make the headlines whereas if it were made by a man it went unnoticed."

Earth Day planning under way

The Coalition for Environmental Quality at the University of Massachusetts is offering one to two credits for working to organize Earth Day 1985.

To earn the credits, a few hours a week will be required to share skills, resources and ideas in the planning of the annual festive spring function.

The event will be held on April 22 and 23 in response to the group's concern for maintaining the quality of the environment.

Earth Day will feature singing, dancing and crafts to spread awareness not only to the University but also to surrounding communities.

To become involved, students should go to the CEQ office in room 306 Student Union or contact Joyce at 545-4312. Deadlines for registration ends Feb. 11 at the close of the add/drop period.

Award checks available today

Financial aid award checks will be available at the Bursar's Office cashiers' area beginning today.

Eligible students with a current University of Massachusetts ID card may pick up their checks today if their last names begin with M-Z, and students whose names begin with A-L can go tomorrow.

Bursar Robert Mishol stressed that these restrictions will be strictly adhered to, but that checks will also be available after tomorrow. Mishol said many students are under the misconception that these two days are the only time checks will be available.

The cashiers' area is open Monday through Friday from 9 a.m. to 3:30 p.m.

UM professor makes nuclear war film

By DEBORAH BRUNO
Collegian Staff

A film being made by a University of Massachusetts professor will explain what can be done to prevent a nuclear war.

Liane Brandon, a School of Education professor, is in the process of making a film titled "How to Prevent a Nuclear War," which is scheduled to be finished in the fall.

It is a documentary and "despite the subject matter, it will not be depressing, it will be upbeat," she said.

Brandon said she decided to make the film because "I got very concerned about the issue and it was something that I could do. If we don't do something, we are in great danger." She said that because most people feel helpless about nuclear war, the film deals with what the "average person can do in terms of preventing a nuclear war."

The film is being funded through foundations and donations from individuals and by the volunteer services of the people working on the film, Brandon said.

Named "The Face to Watch in 1985" by Boston Magazine, Brandon has been a teacher and filmmaker for 12 years. Helping her with the film is Boyd Estus, the film's photography director, who has shot many segments of Nova and National Geographic.

Brandon said the film is being shot in a variety of locations and is half completed. In order to finish, more money must be raised, she said.

Derek Roberts

Professor Liane Brandon, School of Education

The film, when done, will be used by a wide audience including schools, colleges, churches, and peace groups, and can be purchased or rented.

Lynne Fuller, an Amherst Community Service Officer

Community Service Officers get training but little respect walking Amherst beat

By CHRIS POON
Collegian Staff

Lynne Fuller, 20, patrols the streets of Amherst Center at night, occasionally breaking up brawls by the local bars. In return, she said she receives verbal abuse and little respect.

Fuller is a Community Service Officer in Amherst. For the past year and a half, she has been patroling Amherst streets during the late evenings and early mornings for up to 40 hours each week. In addition, Fuller attends Greenfield Community College 20 hours a week.

Community Service Officers (CSO) are special student police officers who are paid to do some police duties in the Amherst Police Department. Those who work the daytime shifts write parking tickets, direct traffic and guard unruly prisoners.

"Community Service Officers are the eyes and the ears of the police department," Sgt. Richard Buckley, who is in charge of the program said. Buckley said the program gives practical experience and job training for people studying law enforcement and criminal justice.

Dressed in gray uniforms to distinguish themselves from regular police officers, CSO are trained to be alert, Buckley said. Because they are not armed, their duty when they encounter a potentially dangerous situation, is to call a police officer, he said.

While Fuller and six other people, all men, currently enrolled in the two-year program have occasionally been branded "rent-a-cops", their positions grant them the power to exercise authority.

"They have the power of arrest if there is an assault on themselves and under the direction of other police officers," Buckley said. Fuller said she has assisted in approximately 15 arrests since she has been in the program.

"Student realize I don't have full police power so I don't always get respect like police officers do, Fuller said. She said the most difficult situations she has encountered since she has been in the program are breaking up fights that end in arrest. "It's hard to handcuff people when they're throwing punches," she said.

Her other duties on the night shift include checking the doors of area businesses to see if they are locked and to deter vandalism.

"I observe as I walk," Fuller said. "After the initial door checks, I just walk where I feel like it, especially where there's high vandalism."

"It doesn't phase me that I'm a female walking by myself at night," Fuller said. She said some of the Amherst police officers have taught her some defense techniques.

Buckley said the CSO program is unique because most police departments don't want students to exercise the rights of police officers and to place themselves in potential jeopardy.

"Most other programs of this type have in-house training, paperwork and other duties, but they're not involved with hands on experience," Buckley said.

"At any given time, there may be nine people in the CSO program," Buckley said. He said this is the fourth group of students in the police department in more than eight years. The students have come from the five-college area as well as Springfield and Westfield.

He said the CSO students increase the manpower of the 29 officer police unit.

Co-op begans 13th year serving veggie meals

By JOEL P. COFFIDIS
Collegian Staff

Earthfoods, a student run cooperative restaurant that will begin its 13th year today provides an all-natural, vegetarian lunch menu as an alternative to other campus eateries.

Located next to the Student Union Ballroom, Earthfoods offers different meatless dishes at lunchtime each weekday. Some meals offered are tofu, lasagna, burritos, quiche and chili.

Earthfodds employs 22 people, each of whom must be undergraduates employee Peter Laurent said.

"There is no manager here. That's what makes it so unique," Laurent said.

Laurent said all the employees form a collective and have an equal say in the operation of the business.

"It's a wonderful place to work because you have a say in what you do," said Employee Kathryn Horgan. "I think a lot of people would enjoy working here," she added.

Each employee works about 10 to 12 hours a week, but many unpaid hours are performed, Laurent said.

"We have weekly meetings and have a decision process called a concensus. Everyone has to agree on each decision," Laurent said. "it gives you a sense of empowerment in your job."

Horgan said that every employee joins a committee which performs a specific task. She added, "We all share the responsibility to help cook and clean up."

Laurent said that by performing different jobs people "do what they want to do."

Earthfoods is allotted the space but given no financial assistance, Laurent said.

"It's non profit and any profit made goes back into the organization as capital," Laurent said.

★Grad Senate

"I think the Board of Trustees and the Administration really want this plan to go through, so it probably will," said Christos Karastamatis, vice-president of the senate.

"The administration seems to feel the financial benefits of the plan are higher than the cost of being fair to graduate students," he added.

Dugal said that since there are 8,000 students required to live in the dormitories and there are spots for 11,000, the administration feels a lower fee for dormitory residents would keep the residence halls full.

"There are some graduate students who could not even get into Prince House, (the graduate and international student dormitory) and 95 percent of graduate students live off campus, so we shouldn't have to be saddled with fees for the dormitories," Dugal said.

"Because of our few raises over the last ten years, the average graduate student with an assistantship suffered a 41 percent decrease in real income between 1973 and 1983," Dugal said.

"If the Universtiy chooses to raise fees again through this plan, it will price itself out of the best students," he added.

The senate is considering events to rally support against the plan, and some of these may include advertisements, planned protests and a letter drive.

Student beat up at frat; Woman reports flasher

By CHRIS POON
Collegian Staff

Several fraternity brothers and pledges from Sigma Phi Epsilon allegedly beat up an 18-year-old University of Massachusetts student Friday night, Amherst police said.

Police said the student, who claimed to be a pledge, was leaving the party when several men assaulted him. The student reported the incident to the police early the next morning while he was being treated at University Health Services for cuts on his face, a missing tooth and an injured leg.

A representative from Sigma Phi Epsilon said the student was not a pledge and that members of the house had to direct him from the party when he became abusive, police said.

In other police news, a woman reported to campus police that a man flashed her while she was working on the first floor in Thompson Hall Monday evening, police said. Police searched the area and found no suspects.

Several car vandalisms and thefts were also reported by the University police.

Two cars were reported to have been vandalized in P-lot by Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium Monday afternoon. The rear window of a 1978 Subaru was smashed and its windshield chipped by rocks. Damage to the car was estimated at $200. Also, the trunk of a 1982 Toyota was tampered with and its tail lights smashed.

A Massachusetts license plate was stolen Monday from a 1975 Chevy parked at University Apartments. The theft of a Florida license plate from a 1983 Toyota, parked by Knowlton dormitory, was also reported Monday.

The theft of an amplifier and turntable was reported from the Northeast Government office in Lewis dormitory Monday morning. The theft occured during intersession.

Use more effective methods

In regard to the recent manner in which certain individuals expressed their political concern of the U.S. intervention in Central America, there are more effective non-violent methods to convey your views.

Your defacing of such University buildings as the Fine Arts Center, Herter Hall, and the Campus Center displays distaste and ignorance in your hopes to alert our community of such reoccurring and unwanted U.S. practices.

Activities such as rallies, educational workshops, literature and other constructive means would enlighten and attract potential supporters to our cause.

What happens next?

After reading Monday's Collegian article on the former UMass student suing Health Services (for allegedly mis-diagnosing a pregnancy four years ago), I am convinced the "Doug and Wendy Winer" characters on Saturday Night Live were modeled after Bruce and Jessica Wenner.

(Scene A small tribunal room. Present are a judge, a lawyer and a physician, and, of course, the Winers.)

Together: "But we didn't wanna have a b-a-a-aby!"

Him: "And I had to take cold sh-o-o-owers"

Her: "And it caused me injury and p-a-a-ain"

Him: "And she started getting fatter and fa-a-atter"

Her: "We didn't know what was wrong for the l-o-o-ongest time"

Together: "We wanna r-e-e-ebate!!!!"

The sad part of this judicial joke, is the humiliation and bitterness that four-year-old girl is going to experience when she is old enough to grasp concepts like 'mistake' and 'wrongful life'.

A generation lost in space, with no time to start again

Diane Lane

The girl's face distorted in anger and hatred as she stabbed her picket sign into the faces of passers-by. She was dressed bizarrely, in punk fashion; her head shaved into a severe mohawk and sporting black chain-like belts on her clothes. Her friends were dressed like her. The place was the First Annual "Yuppie Cotillion" in San Francisco; the objects of their derision were demure, expensively dressed and bejeweled women and men in their early 30s. Evening gowns dripped with sparkling rhinestones, the men wore tuxedoes and the air was full of excitement and perfume. These manicured faces showed only mild distaste as they were forced to confront their younger brothers and sisters.

"You are the generation that betrayed us!!" the punker screamed hoarsely. Over and over she cried out the sentence hysterically not listening to the responses, nor caring how she looked and seemed. For her, there could be no explanation for the behavior of 1980s newest "in" group.

They are yesterday's flower children — beatniks, hippies and yippies who unselfconsciously protested a war only a corrupt morality could justify; who questioned the inevitability and necessity for the moneyed suburban lifestyle they had been nurtured in. In feathery gauze clothes and beads and patched jeans, these yuppies once proclaimed peace and love as their ultimate goals.

You are the generation that betrayed us.

I would never have thought to express it that way, nor was I aware until now of the deep feelings of betrayal within myself. I was a child of the '70s. Barely conscious of the social upheaval caused by the previous generation, my peers and I behaved with a slowness and apathy indicative of enormous energy reserves depleted. Somehow, we knew, the excitement had passed us by. We grew up unquestioning, and wandered into adulthood uninspired and lost.

My admiration for the teenager in the picket line is boundless. She, a child of the '80s, was able to express what I had never allowed myself to feel. The revolution of ideals and morality which the '60s generation promised never came, as they abandoned the cause like so many rats jumping off a sinking ship. The American political situation is no more sensitive now — Big Business and profits drive the huge machinery relentlessly forward. Only now, yuppies are at the helm. One can only imagine the confusion and self-disparagement this should cause the more principled.

"The indignation and protest at injustice that rise in the heart of our generation die slowly, choked off at the surface for lack of an outlet. The Yuppies have shown us that there is nowhere to go within the establishment to carry out idealistic notions. I am chastized by the condescending looks from my former role models."

Certainly we cannot deny them the right to work within the system, or blame them for seeking a living. It is the vengeance with which they are seeking it that frightens me. This is a group who, seemingly, will be satisfied only with big bucks — six figures, at the least.

The indignation and protest at injustice that rise in the heart of our generation die slowly, choked off at the surface for lack of an outlet. The Yuppies have shown us that there is nowhere to go within the establishment to carry out idealistic notions. I am chastized by the condescending looks from my former role models. "You'll see; You'll grow up and then you'll see." What is it that I will see? That my opulent lifestyle and self promotion are far more important than the cries of pain from Third Worlders whose impoverished bodies carry us to our goals? That morality is a childish thing to be put away with dolls and other toys at the proper age? That idealism must always fall away in the face of personal pragmatism?

From my middle point, I am suprised to find I have more in common with this new generation. For the first time, I can begin to understand the clothes and the hair — perhaps as condemnation and isolation for the pain of betrayal. The example the Yuppies provide gives no answers to the questions that trouble me; raising instead more questions. Where do we go from here?

You are, indeed, the generation that betrayed us.

A reluctant farewell to the University

I want to be known that my past two years at the University of Massachusetts were very fulfilling but also disappointing.

I will start with the fulfilling part first. I was a member of the marching band. The band gave me an outlay of friends and an identification within the University. Without it I don't know how I would have survived. This is what I will miss the most.

Why will I miss it? Well because due to academic "red tape", I have had to transfer to another college to continue and finish my education. I ask, why is it necessary to turn away borderline students when they contribute a great deal of respect and represent their school in such a way to give it a good reputation? No, I haven't been on probation — in fact I received a 3.40 last spring semester. Just what happened? Welll it's like this — I tried very hard to gain admission into the School of Management. After two semesters I wasn't accepted because of a BC in one course required when I had to get a B or better. I should add that I received A's in the other courses required. I was told by the dean of the school that the good grades wouldn't offset the borderline one, so I was denied admission. He also explained the main reason for this is because there are so many students competing for so few spaces. I then felt it was a lost battle, so I decided to leave. I know others who have the same problem and may face the same or similar decision.

If this is a problem, why can't the School of Management be enlarged to accomodate the demand? Why do students have to be turned away from what they have decided to pursue as a career? Many who can't transfer to another school because of personal reasons are forced to find another major, and in effect, another career. I guess I am one of the lucky ones, because I was able to transfer to a private business school.

My feelings for this University have changed greatly since my entrance in the fall of 1982. I discredit the School of Mangement to anyone trying to gain admission. I know the school is one of the best, if you're able to get through it. One thing I do credit, very highly, is the marching band. I wish more recognition would be put into this organization. It consists of about 230 very dedicated members and their instructors. Without these people it wouldn't be the same. I'm sorry that this is what had to happen, but in the end maybe it was for the better(?). I hope some day that anyone who enters this University not knowing what they want to do, when they do know, they can pursue it. Maybe this letter is a start.

Phone booth has become her hiding place

Has anyone here noticed that looking for a place to sit and eat, or just to sit, is like trying to find a parking spot at Bloomingdales, the day after before Christmas. Well kiddies, I will let you in on a little secret. But remember it's just between you and me, because if everyone finds out about it, it will be as crowded as all the rest of the places around here. The place is; (are you ready?) The phone booth in the SBA building. Did you ever go there?! Man, what a find. Its like a home away from home. No crowds. If I position myself right I can sit down, eat my lunch, and have enough room to open my coursebook and figure out what to take in place of the E core class, which was cancelled, and which I needed, in order to graduate this semester. But, that's just one of life's little downers, and I found this phone booth so everythings A, O.K.

No longer will I be seduced by the smell of popcorn.

No longer will I be subjected to the smoke of orally fixated people.

And best of all there is no room for a juke box in the phonebooth, and you know what that means... no more Twisted Sister!

The only problem, is that occasionally people stand outside waiting to make a call. So when that happens I just put up a sign that says "ECON 103 C L O S E D". They're so used to that, that like Pavlov's dog, they just go away.

Dancers in drag charm Fac

Les Ballets Trockadero
De Monte Carolo
Fine Arts Center
Monday, Feb. 5

By NANCY A. BUKAR
Collegian Staff

Imagine, if you will, a well-known international ballet troupe on the stage of the Fine Arts Center. All the performers have long, unpronounceable Russian names. As the ballet begins, with a rendition from the second act of Swan Lake, you are entranced by the beauty of the performers and their agility on the stage.

But, wait: why does that ballerina have chest hair? And is the prima donna a man? Why are people making so many mistakes while the audience howls with laughter?

You have been fooled. This is no ordinary dance troupe but the Ballets Trockadero de Monte Carlo, probably the only all-male comedic dance companies that exists today. Their performance at the Fine Arts Center Monday night was well-appreciated; one only had to listen to the audiences' laughter to know that.

The company began with Act II from Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake." While Fifi Chang (Isom Buenavista) danced the lead role as Odette, queen of the Swans, the great master was probably turning in his grave. Sign language and facial expressions between Prince Charming and the Queen led to giggles from the observers. The corps consisted of some very tall "ballerinas" with sideburns and chest hair. Their flustered movements and flubs while attempting to remain on point were hilarious. For solos during this act, performers would merely walk gracefully around the stage, finally finding the point that was marked for them and stand, waiting anxiously until the music began. True comedy.

In "The Lamentations of Jane Eyre," a spoof on what we know as modern dance, three "women" threw themselves across the stage in actions that bring to mind the choreography of Twyla Tharp. The over-dramatic movements only added to the hilarity of it all and the performers (get these: Yurika Sakitumi, Sonia Leftova and Doris Vidanya) did a fine job of near-imitation of a master's work.

A brilliant rendition of Don Quixote was danced by Natalia Schmaltzova (David McCarthy) and Yuri Smirnov (Otis Daye). Natalia's many errors while on point were cause for much amusement and Yuri's exaggerated actions (fixing his shirt sleeves in the middle of a solo) added to the audiences' reaction.

Doris Vidanya (Patrick Kelly) came through once again, dancing a wonderful interpretation of Saint-Saiens' "The Dying Swan." Doris died many, many deaths while performing and came back for about as many demure encores as an audience could take. Her chest hair and sideburns added to the performance immensely.

In the final segment (and my favorite), "To The Fairest", a tale was told from Greek mythology of three goddesses vying for the title of most beautiful. The dancing of Olga Supphozova (Otis Daye) was immensely convincing; one could almost think that he was a she. My favorite characters in this act were the sheep--they provided the majority of amusement and stole a large part of the attention away from the solo performers.

ARTS

Bibliofile's debut

By BRADFORD VERTER
Collegian Staff

Science fiction is gaining increasing recognition as a valid field of literary endeavor. UMass professor Charlotte Spivak, whose study of Ursula LeGuin has recently been published, asserts that fantasy and science fiction are being brought up from the back of the academic bus due "to the passionate involvement of teachers who take it seriously."

Crown Publishers, in an effort to assist SF's literary ascent, has released a series of reprints: Science Fiction Masterworks, each priced at $8.95. Selections include Chad Oliver's Unearthly Neighbors, a classic of anthropological SF; Murray Leinster's The Forgotten Planet, a rather regressive novel; Charles L. Harness' The Paradox Men, a swashbuckling and ingenious adventure; and The Classic Philip Jose Farmer: 1964-1973, the high point of which is the story of Tarzan told with the narrative voice of William S. (rather then Edgar Rice) Burroughs.

Philip Jose Farmer has come out with two other recent books. The Grand Adventure (Berkeley, $7.95 paper) is a collection of short stories illustrated by various artists such as Michael Kaluta, Alec Nino and Robert Gould. Dayworld (Putnam, $16.95), an extrapolation of his short story "The Sliced-Crosswise Only-on-Tuesday World," is an exciting and entertaining futuristic police drama. With several characters giving tribute to Baum's Oz (Dorothy, Ozma, Tik-Tok), the book's only drawback is that it threatens to be another Riverworld series.

Farmer, like Sheckley or Spider Robinson, is known for his humor. Another witty writer, Rudy Rucker, has come out with his sixth novel. Master of Space and Time (Bluejay Books, $14.95). This uproarious book has enough surprises to rival Van Vogt's World of Null-A in shock value.

Bluejay Books has been making a significant mark in the trade publication of SF, releasing books by both new and established writers alike.

Earthblood ($8.95 paper) is a long lost collaboration by SF veterans Keith Laumer and Rosel George Brown. The heroic tenor of this space opera encounters a number of adventures in his search for the legendary world: Earth.

Patricia Kenealy's first book, The Copper Crown ($15.95) is a rather silly fantasy about Celtic ancestors in space. It may make Irish eyes smile. Mine remained glassy.

Oft-lauded Joan D. Vinge also has a volume from Bluejay, Phoenix in the Ashes ($14.95). In this collection of six stories Vinge is stylistically impressive but dull nevertheless.

Quite the reverse is Vernor Vinge, author of True Names ($6.95 paper). His book is fast-moving, the end almost transcendent, but it is awkwardly written.

Perhaps the most notable of Bluejay's recent output is Fire Watch ($14.95), a soaring collection by Connie Willis, Hugo award winner, and two time recipient of the Nebula award. Stories such as "A Letter from the Clearys" and "All My Darling Daughters" make this a particularly memorable book.

Making his first Northampton appearance in over ten years, legendary Roomful of Blues frontman and lead guitarist Duke Robillard belted out two sets of sweltering blues to an enthusiastic Iron Horse audience last Thursday night.

Robillard showcased his innovative and acrobatic style of guitar playing as he manipulated the instrument behind his head, with his teeth and even with his breath. His years of experience became evident the minute he plugged into his amplifier and began his romp over the fret board.

Novel without an ending

Sarah Phillips
by Andrea Lee
Random House, 117 pages, $12.95

By CHRISTINE MARINI
Collegian Staff

An account of Andrea Lee's life could arouse envy in the breast of the most stalwart English major. Not yet 30, Lee, a Philadelphia native, has bachelor's and master's degrees from Harvard University, and is a staff writer for The New Yorker. She has lived in Moscow and Paris for extended periods of time, and currently resides in Rome. Her first book, Russian Journal, an account of her stay in Moscow, was nominated for a National Book Award. Sarah Phillips is Lee's first novel.

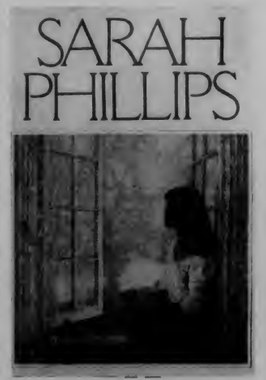
This biographical information is essential for a complete reading of this seemingly "unfinished" short novel. Sarah Phillips tells the story of a young woman strikingly similar to Lee herself. Sarah is the product of an affluent, intellectual upringing in what she calls "the hermetic world of the old-fashioned black bourgeoisie." Her "fortunate" background as well as her own sensitivity and intelligence mark her from childhood. Burdened by the expectations of her family, and by an implied responsibility to her race, Sarah flees to Paris, where the novel begins. It traces Sarah's realization of her situation, her rebellion against it, and finally (we assume) her reconciliation with, and return to, her home.

Unfortunately, the reader of this "life in progress" memoir (which ends rather uncertainly; Sarah is literally in transit, riding on a bus) has to pull things together for himself. Those earmarks which distinguished Lee's Russian Journal — her acute sensibility, unmannered observations, the careful yet lively prose which only occasionally gets caught up in self-consciousness — are further developed in Sarah Phillips. Lee is a tremendously talented writer. But Sarah Phillips, its consistent good writing notwithstanding, misuses the form of the novel. The structure of the work, a series of cameos pulled from Sarah's past, is unsatisfying because it is not unified. These episodes (many of them first published in The New Yorker) are well-crafted but seem random — like a collection of unset gems which we are asked to see as a finished necklace.

Because of this, Lee's painstaking, almost exsquisite prose is belittled.

Sarah Phillips sometimes seems little more than a collection of pretty exercices — a mere self-indulgence on the part of an (admittedly) talented artist.

The reader's frustration reflects Lee's obvious potential for fuller, more satisfying work.



The UPC, DEC and the BMCP proudly present the urban sounds of Run D.M.C. in an all night dance party, Friday February 8th, from 10 p.m. to 4 a.m. in the Student Union ballroom at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. With the band will also be appearing rap artists Dr. Jeckyl and Mr. Hyde. tickets are $9.00 for students and $8.00 for non-students, and $8.00 the night of the show. Tickets will go on sale Thursday, January 31st at the FAC box office and all Datatix locations in Northampton, Greenfield and Hadley and will be available at the door.

Run D.M.C. has been described as being the hottest group in rap music today. Their first long play single was said to be the finest rap albumn to date. The band's success is due largely to their creativity in combining many other musical elements to create their own unique blend of "graffitti rock". Their infectious heavy metal flavor has earned them a great deal of attention from both listeners and critics alike, as well as drawing fans from the rock music audience.

Attention all new and old Arts staffers! We will be holding our first staff meeting of the semester this Thursday at 7 p.m. in the newsroom. Be there!

"A guide to absolute rock-bottom prices."

Ask your friends who've traveled in Europe: the odds are overwhelming they used and trusted the Let's Go Travel guides. Why?

Let's Go is written entirely by students traveling on budgets as limited as yours. No expense accounts, no free hotel rooms.

Let's Go guides are the only ones revised from top to bottom every year, on the spot.

So prices are current and listings up-to-date. No tourist traps, no rip-offs, and lots of new discoveries every year. And no other budget guide includes all this:
• where the cheap-but-safe hotels are
• how to find inexpensive good eating, even in out-of-the-way places
• in-depth information on history, culture, and the people
• getting off the beaten track, be it by rail, bus or bike
• emergency addresses and phone numbers, and more.

You'll feel like a traveler instead of a tourist when you have a Let's Go budget guide—the candid, complete money-saver that The New York Times calls "the granddaddy of all student guidebooks...by far the best source of information on the specific scene in each country."

And if you're not bound for Europe or the Mediterranean, don't miss the popular Let's Go USA, Let's Go California and the Pacific Northwest, and the brand-new Let's Go Mexico. There's no better way to see America or Mexico than with a pied piper that will lead you away from the clutter and crowds." —Houston Post

WE WANT YOU TO START AT THE TOP.

THEN WORK YOUR WAY UP.

You can be part of the greatest alliance in American business history — Electronic Data Systems and General Motors. This alliance combines the information processing strengths of EDS with the resources of the largest company in the nation. And with it comes vast opportunities for you — the kind that business professionals can spend their entire careers seeking. You're already starting at the top with our outstanding resources for growth and success. And the only way to go is up.

We're looking for self-starters — people with the confidence to set high goals and the determination to reach them. We want to put you at the core of EDS' operations as a Systems Engineer. EDS Systems Engineers use both business and technical skills to solve complex problems for our clients.

The SED Program will prepare you for the leadership responsibilities you will have in the EDS and GM alliance. It lasts approximately 18 months and will undoubtedly be one of the most rigorous and rewarding business experiences of your life. You'll receive intensive classroom training, and you'll also have the chance to deal directly with our customers. You'll gain knowledge that will place you far ahead of your peers. And when you graduate, you'll have an exciting position with unlimited growth potential.

To qualify for the SED Program, you must be a college graduate with a technical aptitude and an outstanding record of achievement. You should have a major in Management Information Systems, Computer Information Systems, Computer Science, or Engineering. We will also consider candidates with any academic major and a strong interest in business and information processing. In addition, you must be flexible to relocate and travel. Finally, you must be a U.S. citizen or permanent resident. If you are a successful candidate, EDS will reward you with a competitive compensation package. And you're sure to thrive in our corporate environment where rewards are based on achievement — not seniority.

TAKE THE FIRST STEP TOWARD JOINING THE GREATEST ALLIANCE IN AMERICAN BUSINESS HISTORY.

Minutemen snag junior-college football stars

Part of 'exellent' recruiting job-Stull

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

Two junior-college tranfers and a prep sch... product are at the head of what University of Massachusetts head football coach Bob Stull has labled, "an excellent recruiting class."

One of the strengths that landed Stull, an ex-Washington assistant, the UMass job last May was his recruiting ability and that talent has paid off for the Minutemen.

"I think that these three players are among the top players at their level you will see and I'm very pleased to have them in school," Stull said. "I'm confident that they'll compete for jobs in spring practice and will make an impact."

Two transfers from Nassau Community College on Long Island, the same school that produced kicker George Papoutsidis, will give UMass both size and speed in skill positions.

Al Neri, a 6-2, 230 pound fullback started his college career at C.W. Post as a linebacker before going to Nassau. He was sought by both Northwestern and Central Florida after being named all Atlantic Coast.

"He's a big strong player with good speed, good hands and excellent size," assistant coach Steve Telander said. "I expect he will compete for a starting job right away."

Lonny Brock, a 6-1, 190 pound wide receiver/defensive back with 4.5 speed in the 40 yard dash, is also enrolled at UMass from Nassau.

"I'm suprised we got him," Telander admitted. "Schools like Arizona were after him and he's a definite Division 1 prospect. They (Arizona) played games with him and when they tried to get him back, I was at his home with the signed papers."

Brock caught 38 passes to lead Nassau and was an All-Eastern slection. He also played tailback for a game and according to Stull, is a good enough athlete to be considered for either offense or defense. Both have two years of eligibility.

John Gillen, a 6-3, 230 pound linebacker, was recruited by UMass out of Halifax, Mass. high before going to Milford Academy to prep for a season.

An agressive player that goes to the ball well according to Telander, Gillen also visited Pitt before settling on UMass. He will have four years to play.

"These guys are top players, as big and fast as any other players, as big and fast as any other players at their positions in the Yankee Conference," Telander said. "We looked for size and speed and got it."

The rest of the class will be announced next Wednesday, national letter-of-intent day. The 20-23 member class has freshmen, from many states and "is much better than we expected to get," Stull said.

Telander said that the Minuteman assitants went out of state, where UMass' reputation is stronger, to get players.

"This school has, for some reason, a bad in-state rap, so we went looking," he said. "We felt we needed skill players to help our depth. The amount of quality new players we'll have will help the team's attitude, intensity, and overall skill."

Minutewomen's win streak snapped by Dartmouth, 66-57

Fitzgerald and Lewis get 17

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

HANOVER, N.H. — The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team had its winning streak snapped at three, falling to Dartmouth 66-57 last night in New Hampshire.

The Minutewomen, 9-12, went ahead with 8:21 to go in the game on a Jerrie Bernier basket, but turned the ball over three consecutive times downcourt, allowing the Green to get back into the game and eventually win it.

UMass was led by Karen Fitzgerald and Tara Lewis with 17 points each. Fitzgerald also had nine rebounds with Lewis getting seven.

Dartmouth's Jayne Daigle and Sue Stoddard had 21 points apieee as the Green climbed to 6-13 on the season.

At the half, Dartmouth led 33-26 with a successful mixing of defenses that held UMass' high scorer, junior guard Barbara Hebel to two points.

The Green also converted on their foul shots, hitting 14-of-21 with UMass getting seven-of-17. Dartmouth had only one more field goal (26-of-61) then the Minutewomen (25-of-55).

Coach Barbara Steven cited Dartmouth's second chances off the boards and the crucial turnovers after taking the lead as reasons for the loss.

Bernier joined Fitzgerald and Lewis in double figures with 12 points.

The Minutewomen also failed several times to convert on the fast break in the late going, missing good chances to get back into the game. Dartmouth converted the misses and turnovers into foul shots in the final minutes to slip away.

The Minutewomen, despite giving away a lot of height to a Green frontline that went 6-0, 6-1, and 6-2, outrebounded the home team 39-38.

The women return home to face another New England rival, the University of Maine, Sunday at Amherst College.

MINUTEWOMEN MUTTERINGS: Hebel is only the third woman in UMass history to break 1,000 points. She trails Julie Ready (1,406) and Sue Peter (1,887) in the all-time career scoring race. If she equals her sophomore year output (435 points) this year and next year, she will take over second place. Peters (1977-80) seems unapproachable.

Karen Fitzgerald 24 points against Lehigh, then undefeated, is UM's season-high for a single game. Coach Barbara Stevens said yesterday that recruiting is going well for the Minutewomen. She will have several players, including a 5-11 forward, in Amherst for a visit. "We'd like to get a little more team height," Stevens said. The tallest Minutewoman is Fitzgerald at 6-2 with no other player over 5-11. The Atlantic 10 being as good a women's conference as it is, height is a major need.

St. Johns remains on top, Hoyas second in hoop poll

By The Associated Press

St. John's, which puts its 13-game winning streak on the line Saturday in a Big East Conference road game against Villanova, remained No. 1 for the second straight week in the Associated Press college basketball poll announced Tuesday.

The 18-1 Redmen, who had to come from 14 points down to beat Seton Hall 87-76 Monday night, attracted 60 of 62 first-place votes and 1,238 points from the nationwide panel of sports writers and broadcasters.

Last week St. John's beat Providence 77-60 and Connecticut 97-64 and is one of four Big East teams in the Top 20. Three of those, St. Johns, Georgetown and Syracuse, are in the top six.

Georgetown stayed No. 2, Memphis State No. 3 and The Hoyas, 19-2, who held the top spot in the preseason poll and the first nine regular season polls before losing two straight, landed one first-place vote and 1,153 points. Memphis State, 17-1, received the remaining No. 1 vote and 1,126 points, 93 ahead of Southern Methodist, 18-2.

Duke, fourth last week, moved up a notch with 909 points. Syracuse, the only team besides St. John's to beat Georgetown, advanced from No. 9 to sixth with 899 points, while Oklahoma remained No. 7 with 855.

Michigan 769 points was eighthfollowed by Illinois 748 and Georgia tech 704 to complete the Top Ten.

Nevada — Las Vegas, boasting a 16-game winning streak, the longest winning streak in Division I, leaped from No. 16 to head the Second Ten.

Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana Tech, North Carolina, Oregon State, Tulsa, DePaul, Villanova and Maryland round out the Top Twenty.

Iowa, 18-4, is the only newcomer to the poll this week after registering road victories over Big Ten Conference rivals Indiana and Ohio State.

Neysmith, Braun among A-10 leaders

University of Massachusetts forwards Horace Neysmith and Hobby Braun are second and third in rebounding in the Atlantic 10 in statistics released yesterday.

Braun, with 8.5 rebounds per game and Neysmith with 8.3, trail George Washington's Michael Brown (11.8) for the conference lead.

Neysmith is also averaging 15.7 points-per-game with Braun scoring just under 10 a contest.

Point guard Carl Smith continues to lead the league in assists with 49. The Minutemen are at St. Bonaventure on Thursday night.

Local congressmen condemn financial aid cuts

By PHIL SERAFINO

Collegian Staff

Two local congressmen lashed out yesterday at President Ronald Reagan's proposed cutbacks in financial aid to college students, saying that the measure faced strong opposition in the House of Representatives.

U.S. Rep. Silvio Conte (R-Pittsfield) said in a speech before college administrators in Washington that limiting financial aid to $4,000 per student annually "could in one fell swoop put many of our colleges and universities beyond the reach of many poor and middle-class students."

Arthur Jackson, director of financial aid at UMass has said that Reagan's proposal would affect about 16,000 UMass students alone and would prohibit about 3,000 of those students from returning to school in the fall of 1987.

A spokesman for Rep. Edward Boland (D-Springfield) said that Congress would look with "equal vigor at all programs, including those in the Defense Department" to see where cuts could be more effective. Spokesman Michael Sheehy also remarked that opposition was strong against not only student assistance programs, but against many reductions in the proposed budget for fiscal year 1986.

Conte said in his speech before the Council for the Advancement and Support of Education that the issue of federal aid should "be discussed when reauthorization comes up in Congress, not as part of the budget."

Reauthorization is the process by which federal funding is reallocated by the congresional committee responsible for the program after initial funding has expired.

Conte's press secretary Missy Tessier noted that federal funding for college students must be reauthorized later this year by the Education Committees of the House and Senate.

Sheehy warned, however, that reauthorization can be circumvented by a process called reconciliation, whereby the budget committee can order reauthorization prior to its due date. This would allow the budget reductions to be enforced without coming before the Education Committee.

President Reagan's budget for 1986 seeks to restrict eligibility for federal loans to students with family incomes under $32,000, and limit individual students to $4,000 in aid a year. Money earned through the work-study program would count towards the $4,000 total.

Sheehy also said that government loans "have gone a long way to making college education affordable...Rep. Boland will resist any attempts to shrink these programs."

Conte said that the administration's proposals "are even more extreme" than those in the past, and "potentially quite harmful."

Student lobbyists plan trip to Washington asking for aid

By BETHANNE MOSKOV
Collegian Staff

A group of University of Massachusetts advocates will be traveling to Washington D.C. next month to lobby against President Ronald Reagan's proposed cutbacks in financial aid.

Students Advocating Financial Aid (SAFA) held their first meeting of the semester Tuesday night to discuss the annual trip and possible strategies against proposed cuts in the 1986 federal fiscal year budget.

Antenna plan gains support

By LESLEY CLARK
Collegian Staff

Several Hampshire County residents have formed a Committee of Civic Responsibility to support the United States Air Force's proposal to build a 300-foot radio tower in Amherst which would transmit signals to other locations in the event of a nuclear attack.

"The tower serves the cause of peace, and as such deserves public support," Arnold Silver, a member of the group said. Silver is a resident of Amherst.

"The presence of the tower would reduce the temptation by an adversary to launch a first-strike attack," Silver said. "It is purely defensive.

Silver, an English professor at the University of Massachusetts, said the town selectmen were "acting hostile" when they voted last week to oppose the tower.

"Nobody is eager to have an antenna in town, but the town should have some sense of patriotic obligation," he said. He added that the group is urging the selectmen to rescind their decision and hold a public hearing on the proposal.

"The selectmen's objections to the proposal, based on costs for policing the area seem grossly overestimated," Silver said. "Amherst town officials should not have their policies governed by the threat of intimidation."

The Hampshire County Commissioners will hold a public hearing Tuesday on the Air Force's proposal. Arthur Quinton, a physics professor at UMass, will argue the committee's position. Quinton said the construction of the tower is "a scientific and technical question, not a political one, and should be addressed as such."

Representatives from the Air Force and the Department of Defense will attend the meeting.

The proposed tower is part of a $122 million national communication system that will cover the Northeastern part of the country. Termed Ground Wave Emergency System, it is designed to provide communication between defense posts in the event of a nuclear attack.

Radio transmissions are bounced off the atmosphere, but in a nuclear blast, the atmosphere would be disrupted, making normal radio transmission impossible. The 300-foot tower is designed to provide communication after an attack by sending radio waves along the surface of the earth. Proposed sites include 12 acres on Stanley street in South Amherst, approximately 1.2 miles from the town common.

SGA gives concert cash

By JOHN YONCE
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate of the University of Massachusetts voted 30-5 last night to give $29,000 toward funding for several spring events on campus including the Union Program Council Spring Concert series.

Students representing the five groups to receive the funds agreed Tuesday night that $34,500 was the minimum needed to fund the UPC concert, an area concert each for: Southwest Residential Area, the Eastside Residential Areas, the Greek Residential Area and a production by the UMass Music Theater Guild.

The motion was made to allot $29,000 instead of the $34,000 requested becasue that figure was the most the senate could afford to spend, SGA Treasurer John Morradian said.

UPC representatives said that the additional money would be sought from untapped sources such as the Graduate Student Senate and the UMass Chancellor's Office.

When a motion was made to table the motion until next week, granting the funds UPC business manager Eric Nitzsche said the motion had to be voted this week to improve the chance for the quality of the shows.

"Every day earlier that we know how much money we have gives us greater flexibility and may help us get greater talent," he said.

SGA Budgets Committee chairman Joe Sparks said he opposed the motion to grant the money because the senate can not afford the concerts.

"My concern is that we're going to have to somehow deal with a decline in student enrollment," Sparks said. A decline from projected estimates in enrollment would cause the senate to have less money then anticipated, he said. This could cause other groups which might need the money later the inability to get it, he said.

"An enrollment decrease will take its toll in next year's budget accounts," Sparks said.

Other senators spoke in favor of the motion because of obligations to students to provide activities.

In other business, the senate granted $14,000 to the Off-Campus Housing Office for running expenses, 2,500 was granted to the University Child Care Office and $3,500 to the SGA Communications Office by the senate.

Reagan optimistic in address

President speaks of second revolution

WASHINGTON (AP) - President Reagan, in his fourth State of the Union address, yesterday declared "a second American Revolution" of hope, opportunity, technological progress and the promise of a free and peaceful world.

Of his first four years, Reagan said, "We did what we promised, and a great industrial giant is reborn."

In the address before a joint session of Congress on his 74th birthday, Reagan set his agenda for a second term, saying:

"The time has come to proceed toward a great new challenge - a Second American Revolution of hope and opportunity; a revolution carrying us to new heights of progress by pushing back frontiers of knowledge and space; a revolution of spirit that taps the soul of America, enabling us to summon greater strength than we have ever known; and a revolution that carries beyond our shores the gold promise of human freedom in a world at peace."

Reagan said he spoke for all Americans and those abroad who yearn for freedom.

"We are here to speak for millions in our inner cities who long for real jobs, safe neighborhoods, and schools that truly teach," Reagan said.

Chernenko reported ill by a Soviet

ROME (AP) - The state-run Italian television network said yesterday it had interviewed a leading Soviet journalist who confirmed that Soviet leader Konstantin U. Chernenko is ill.

The state-run television network, RAI-1, said that Viktor Afanasiev, director of the Communist Party newspaper, Pravda, "confirmed the illness of Chernenko" during an interview.

Chernenko, 73, was last seen in public on Dec. 27 and there have been persistent reports in Moscow and abroad that he is ailing.

The network gave no other details, nor did it provide exact quotes, but said the interview would be broadcast later in the day on a special late-night news program.

Man charged

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) - A former teacher pleaded innocent yesterday in Middlesex Superior Court to indictments charging him with raping eight boys, indecently assaulting a ninth boy and posing eight of them nude for pictures.

Lawrence O. Brehaut, 41, who coached a boy's soccer program in his hometown of Wakefield and was a Boy Scout troopmaster at the time of the alleged rapes, was allowed to remain free on $25,000 surety with a $2,500 cash alternative.

Report shows Amherst women profs. dissatisfied

By DEBORAH ROSS
Collegian Staff

In the spring of 1983, the Faculty Executive Committee at Amherst College received letters from two dissatisfied members of the women faculty. In the following fall, the Committee responded by commissioning a report of the status of women faculty at Amherst and the recently issued results reveal that the dissatisfaction is widespread.

The Sofield Report, prepared by a faculty committee of two men and three women, was commissioned to explore "the possibility that conditions for faculty women at Amherst were not satisfactory," English Professor David Sofield, chair of the project, said.

The results of the study, which Sofield described as "surprising in the depth of dissatisfaction it revealed," have been distributed to all faculty members and is currently being formally considered by President Peter Pouncey and the Executive Committee, Sofield said.

The Sofield Report...was commissioned to explore "the possibility that conditions for faculty women at Amherst were not satisfactory," English professor David Sofield said.

According to the report, based on interviews, meetings and surveys, 97 percent of full professors, 87 percent of associate professors, and 65 percent of the assistant professors for 1983-1984 are male.

"When the college went co-educational in 1975, there was no discussion of co-educating the faculty," said Russian Professor Stephanie Sandler, a member of the committee that prepared the report. "It was as if the faculty could take care of itself," she added.

Sofield said "It's not surprising that so few professors are female" if you consider that before 1975, Amherst had been "a male institution for over 150 years."

Although things are changing slowly, we do expect the number of women faculty to improve in a decade or two," he said.

Another major finding of the report showed women faculty members as disproportionately burdened with committee responsibilities and this experience was, the report states, "not empowering but tokenizing."

Women complained that their opinions on these committees did not carry the same weight as their male collegues, they were rarely given leadership positions and their contributions and perspectives were treated as biased and trivial.

"The actual costs in tokenism, isolation and overwork of having one woman on each committee far outweigh the benefits" the report states, a conclusion it attributes to the problem of "too few women to go around."

The report also charges that the accepted practices of Amherst are based on what it calls "a model of the one career family with the spouse's support" and this "practice appears to work to the disadvantage of women."

In particular, the "tenure clock," requires a decision in the sixth year of a faculty member's involvement at Amherst "assumes a life in the main, free from certain distractions such as childrearing." The report states this may account for the fact that while only 20 percent of male professors are untenured, 67 percent of untenured women professors fall into this category.

The report recommends that this imbalance could be improved if the probation period for tenure decisions be extended to the eighth year.

Another issue which emerged from the study was Amherst's insufficient support for a women's studies curriculum. Of the 400 courses Amherst offered in its catalogue this semester, only 11 were categorized in the women's studies section.

According to Sandler, the introduction of a complete women's studies program is being considered at present by the Executive Committee and, she said, "although I don't know when it will be created and or what form it will take, my sense is that it is sure to come about."

The report also revealed Amherst's failure to adequately recognize the demands of childrearing. This is shown by no day-care center, insufficient flexibility in class schedules, the overburdening of women with committee duties and what the report describes as a "negative attitude toward children" which makes women feel "unprofessional for parenting."

One woman interviewed said that she never tried to reschedule a meeting if one of her children was sick; she would rather claim to be ill herself than have her collegues think being a mother came before her job.

The report also talks at length about the morale of women at Amherst, and contends that women are made to feel "isolated, alienated, peripheral and marginal" Sofield said.

"The male ethos at Amherst has been so strong and firmly established for so long many women feel left out," he said.

One faculty woman questioned said she was often expected to give the "female perspective" at every discussion with her male collegues, but when she did so was accused of "knee-jerk feminism."

The report, although it does make some recommendations, does not demand solutions for the issues it raised. It was prepared "to at least say what the problems are and raise consciousness about them," Sandler said.

Sofield described the report as "an address to conscience in that it appeals to the men at Amherst to examine their assumptions," he said.

Asked whether he thought the results of the study would be taken seriously and provide a basis for change, Sofield replied, "Administration and faculty have read the report carefully and I'm sure it will do some good."

DVP offers wide assortment ; King scheduled for April

By STEVE HIGGINS
Collegian Staff

The Distinguished Visitors Program, a registered student organization, is offering an assortment of prominent speakers this semester, including suspense novelist Stephen King and pro-choice activist Bill Baird.

Stephen King is scheduled to speak on April 1, and Bill Baird is tentatively scheduled for early March, Mark Zuckerman, co-chairman of the DVP said.

"I'm glad we got Bill Baird because UMass was the first organization to come out for him in 1969," Zuckerman said. Baird, in 1965, opened the nation's first abortion clinic in Hempstead, NY.

Also being featured this semester are Dr. Helen Caldicott, former director of Physicians for Social Responsibility, on April 9, and Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.). The date for Bradley's visit has not yet been set.

In addition to running its own programs, DVP sponsors guests with other UMass organizations.

"Between $6,000 and $10,000 of our operating budget goes to groups who come to us for help," Zuckerman said.

Among the speakers which the DVP is co-sponsoring this semester are Nikki Giovanni, keynote speaker for the March 8 International Women's Event, and Earth Day speaker Marilyn Ferguson on April 22 and 23.

Working through speaker's agencies, DVP runs an average four or five programs a semester, Zuckerman said.

"We have a pretty good reputation for treating speakers well, and that helps," Zuckerman said.

Begun in 1959 from an endowment, the 15-member organization has an annual operating budget of about $30,000, part of which comes from the Student Activities Trust Fund, Zuckerman said.

Human Services and School of Ed. hold social awareness workshops

By JODI McNAMARA

Collegian Correspondent

Courses designed to increase the understanding of social awareness issues are being offered at both graduate and undergraduate levels at the University of Massachusetts by the Human Services Program and the School of Education.

The Oppression and Social Issues Training Project is designed to educate students about some of the social issues affecting today's society.

"The workshops are intended to create an awareness of social issues in society, and to explore how the course of study is affected by anti-semitism, racism, sexism, heterosexism, and classism," Bailey Jackson, project director said.

Courses offered at the graduate level deal with subjects such as racial perspective, social issues in education and social issues training and educational methods. By enrolling in these courses, graduate students are trained to teach courses at the undergraduate level of the training project.

Graduate courses are taught by Jackson and Gerry Weinstein. Jackson said he hopes to help the graduate students to integrate the issues into their teaching, consulting and managing.

Courses offered at the undergraduate level include discussions on racism, sexism, anti-semitism, handicappism, heterosexism and classism. Students will receive one credit for attending one eight-hour workshop from 9-5 p.m., offered on various weekend days throughout the semester.

A full-time class is offered at the undergraduate level for three credits on oppression and social change. Registration in this course is permitted after completing three of the one credit workshops.

★ SAFA

Faculty adviser Jerry Grady expressed the importance of this year's trip because of Reagan's plan which seeks to deny student loans to families with incomes above $32,500, restrict Pell Grants to families earning above $25,000 and a $4,000 ceiling in all aide to each student per year.

"Under Reagan's proposal," Grady said, approximately 16,000 UMass students would be affected, 3,000 of whom would not be able to return to the University in the fall of 1987.

"We want to fight this," Grady said. "Education is an investment not an expense."

Grady also said the more expensive private schools will be in great danger because very few of their students will be eligible for financial aid.

"UMass SAFA students are well known and well liked. They don't carry signs in protest, they simply work in a professionsl and intelligent way that has earned them a lot of respect in Washington," he said.

Cindy Howland, president of SAFA said the dates for the trip have been set for March 3rd through March 6.

"Our goal," Howland said "is to let Congress and students know that we care about financing our education."

In the three days that we are down there we want to key into members of the Education committee, appropriations committee and various subcommittees", she said.

Jim Shaw, former president of SAFA, explained that the fifty students going will be broken into ten groups of five so that each group can reach eight to ten congress people and committee members.

The trip will be partially financed through money raised by SAFA. The group will petition for the student senate finance committee to contribute funds. They are also asking the area governments to help defray the costs.

UMassprig fights for environment

An investigation of a chemical company and a food waste education program along with many projects initiated last fall are among a University of Massachusetts lobby group's efforts.

The Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG) asserts that Pfizer Inc., a mass producer of chemical products in Adams, Mass., disposes lime derivative wastes in front of a water treatment plant, according to a report by project leader Jackie Mailhot.

A spokesman from Pfizer Inc. refused to comment and said that he was unaware of any such situation or of MassPIRG's charge.

Members of the food waste education program, a part of Mass PIRG, hope to heighten the University community's awareness about the false notion of food over-abundance in the U.S. The members of the project are planning dormitory workshops and will give information on the subject in the dining commons.

From last semester's campaign, MassPIRG will continue to push for the passage of a bill that would "prevent acid rain from getting worse in the state," staff member Teresa Dawson said. This bill would limit how much sulfur power plants, factories, cars and other sources of sulfur dioxide could emit.

The water quality project will maintain its goal "to take the appropriate actions necessary toward making Amherst water resources more healthful and better managed," project leader Lori Rocchio said.

Some of the sites that she and her group will be working on are the Tillson Farm Coal Pile, the Lawrence Swamp Aquifer and the Atkins Reservoir.

MassPIRG was "very successful" last semester in achieving some of their goals, Dawson said. "We got the Pollution Penalties bill passed, which is key in enforcing environmental laws." The bill authorizes the Department of Enviornmental Quality Engineering to bill state pollution violators from $100 to 10,000 per day for violating the Clean Air Act. "We also negotiated with Amherst's town manager in order to instigate an annual Selectman's Meeting concentrating on current water issues," Dawson said.

Withdrawal for non-health fee payers

By JOHN VINCENT
Collegian Staff

Students who refuse to pay their University Health Services (UHS) bill will be administratively withdrawn from the University of Massachusetts.

About three students a semester who do not pay their bills or fail to establish a payment plan with UHS after receiving a number of bills, are withdrawn, Donna Yezierski, UHS business supervisor said.

UHS provides many services which include physician visits, eye examinations, emergency and dental care for free or at a minimal charge to students who pay the mandatory $93 UHS semesterly fee.

When students are withdrawn, said Marion Marquell of the Registrar's Office, they lose their classes and financial aid, although there is a chance they may regain it if the bill is immediately paid thereafter.

Yezierski said the trouble of arranging to pay a student's debt, and then be reinstated, is a small worry compared to the consequences of a collection agency.

"The collection agencies call you at nine, 10 (o'clock) at night, they have no conscience," she said. "If people think about it, they would rather be withdrawn than be hounded by a collection agency."

Rose Marie Strother, UHS financial manager, said that if a student's name is sent to a collection agency, it remains a black mark on the student's credit rating with banks for seven years.

Office helps foreign students cope with new environment

By DANIEL CALNAN
Collegian Correspondent

If you're a foreign student at the University of Massachusetts and find huge supermarkets, co-ed bathrooms and video arcades strange, there's help.

Located in the Whitmore Administration Building, the Foreign Students Office assists more than 1,200 foreign students at UMass with adapting to a new school, a new culture and a new land.

"Our mission here is to try to alleviate any problems that the students might have so they can get on with their studies," Fred Schulten, foreign student adviser said.

Once the student is settled, the office offers academic, legal and personal advising.

The office contacts the students as soon as they are accepted to the University.

"The student's file comes immediately to this office, and we send out pre-registration forms, arrival information, and general information about the office," Schulten said.

Brief orientation sessions are held at the beginning of each semester because it is usually impossible for the student to travel to the U.S. to attend summer advising and orientation, he said. The office was established as the main contact on campus for the foreign student.

Because foreign undergraduate students can not receive financial aid and it is difficult for them to obtain permission to work, the office confirms that the students will be able to meet the expenses of attending the University before they enroll at UMass, he said. A satisfactory command of English must also be confirmed before the student is allowed to enroll, he added.

There are several reasons why a student will travel to the U.S. to receive a college education. A major reason, Schulten said, is that many foreign governments sponsor the student for overseas study. Some foreign students come upon a recomendation of a friend or a relative and some simply come on their own.

Foreign students at UMass represent more than 100 nations, the largest delegations coming from India and Taiwan. More than half of all foreign students at UMass are graduate students. Some are part of mutual exchange programs where UMass students attend classes overseas for a year while foreign students take courses here.

Some exchanges involve faculty and researchers who are working and studying at the University. The office offers assistance to these groups as well.

Most foreign students upon receiving their degree, plan to return to their homeland and pursue their careers, Schulten said.

Annex starts with late orders

By DAVID MUNIZ
Collegian Staff

No matter what major, year or grade point average, every student at the University of Massachusetts must make at least one trip to the Textbook Annex.

This semester, rising costs of books and late orders by at least 44 professors are what lies ahead for those who have not yet frequented the school's largest supplier of books.

Since last week, "we have recently received 44 late orders by professors for classes this semester," Russell Evans, manager of the annex said.

Faculty were requested to order books for this semester by last October, he said. The main reason for such early ordering is so that the annex will be able to buy back books from students before it orders books from publishers. "That way, we can buy the books we need from students at 50 percent off the publisher's list price," Evans said. He refused to disclose the annex mark-up of used books.

"Since January, we have had 240 new course orders. A professor doesn't realize that he is not the only one ordering late," Evans said that an order may consist of one to 30 books.

From the time the annex places an order to the time the books are on a shelf usually takes between a week to 10 days.

Publishers have raised prices an average of between 5 and 10 percent since last semester, Evans said. The increase depends on the publisher he said.

"A book that cost $26.95 last semester may cost $29.95 this semster. Prices are raised right before an ordering cycle. The last cycle ended December 1. Students may pay as little as 95 cents or as high as $50 for a book, Evans added.

Even though the Annex sells the most textbooks to students, Evans said, "we have the same volume as last year, it's running pretty smooth. All in all, it's pretty calm, no big lines."

The Textbook Annex does not calculate sales on a daily basis. "I have no idea right now how many titles have been sold in a day or in a week, we don't deal in quantity per week. At the end of the semester we determine what has been sold. We just have to wait and see," Evans said.

Roughly 125 students return books per day during the first week of classes. Those books are then resold. Books that are not sold by March are sent back to the publishers. "We start returning books just prior to Spring Break." Evans said, but by the end of the semester, we usually have sold 85 percent of the 4,500 titles that we have in stock." That's a lot of reading.

Center counsels and trains

By BRION McALARNEY
Collegian Correspondent

The Psychological Services Center at the University of Massachusetts trains graduate students to be clinical psychologists while providing inexpensive counseling services to the community.

Located in Tobin Hall, the center is supervised by 10 faculty members from the department of psychology and has been training graduate students for 22 years.

"We have the most intense supervision one would find in a psychotherapy program," associate director, Richard Halgin said.

Every hour of therapy between the graduate student psychologists and their clients is matched by an hour of discussion between the students and the faculty supervisors, Halgin said.

"The student-psychologists typically have no more than three clients and discuss each client, one at a time, with a supervisor," Halgin said.

"Eight out of 500 students were accepted last year for the six year doctorate program; there are no masters degrees."

The graduate students are not paid he added.

The center had 218 clients last year, including families and couples, with more than 1,400 sessions, according to its annual report.

"There are no age restrictions, and 15-20 percent of the clients are UMass students," said administrative assistant Toni Towson.

According to the center's annual report, it offers a wide range of services including information and referral, individual psychotherapy, group therapy, marital and family therapy and psychological testing and assessment.

"The most common service is dealing with interpersonal difficulties, with a specific person or people in general," Halgin said.

"The most severe cases are people who are seriously depressed or suicidal."

The PSC also provides an information and referral service from which it receives 30 to 40 calls per week, he said.

Clients are referred to the center by other professional physicians and psychotherapists, agencies and departments at the University and by telephone.

Students with dyslexia or other learning disabilities can find help at the Communications Skills Center in Bartlett Hall.

The center is a free "academic support service for students," Director Shirley DeShields said.

The center "has the most comprehensive diagnostic component," to identify learning problems of students and to address their problems, she said.

"CSC works in conjunction with the Development Center Counseling, Communications Disorders and the psychology departments" to provide a complete evaluation of a student's learning skills, DeShields said.

Students are screened to evaluate their learning skills, and a counseling session is held to discuss test results and plan a program of study, according to a CSC brochure. The program may include individual instruction, independent study and small group discussions.

Students that need short-term help with writing skills for class or projects can also get help from the center's Walk-In Writing Workshop. Workshop hours will be posted in 68 Bartlett Hall.

The center also offers 14 communications skills courses this semester, including Fundamentals of Writing and College Reading Skills.

DeShields estimated that between testing, counseling and courses, the center serves 2,000 to 3,000 students per year.

"We also have older, returning students who want to brush up on their communication skills, transfers from community colleges who want to bridge the gap (to a four year college) and freshmen who have found the college experience more challenging than anticipated," DeShields said.

"The center's courses have helped me to succeed in all courses at the University," said junior Patrick Costello, president of the Dyslexic Student Organization. Dyslexia is a complex learning disability affecting as many as 1,700 students at UMass.

"The DSO provides peer counseling to prepare dyslexic and learning disabled students for problems they will face outside," and refers students to CSC for testing and counseling, Costello said.

The center is open from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. in 73 Bartlett Hall.

Police report small fire, stolen athletic items from Boyden gym

A small fire outside of McNamara dormitory was reported by a University of Massachusetts police officer Tuesday evening, police said.

Police said several pieces of paper may have been thrown out a window and ignited outside the dormitory. No damages were reported.

In other police reports:

- Three sets of athletic department towels, tee-shirts and sweatsuits were stolen from three lockers in Boyden Gymnasium and was reported Tuesday morning. The belongings were valued at $150.
- A Hampshire College student was arrested by campus police Tuesday night on a warrant for speeding from Brookline District Court. Police said the student was arrested for speeding on University Drive.
- A wallet containing $5 was reported stolen from a Hills North office Tuesday afternoon. It was taken from a knapsack in an unlocked room.

Mother needs money to get children

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

A lack of finances might be the only factor preventing a University of Massachusetts student from bringing her daughters home from Sri Lanka after they were kidnapped by their father last Nov.

Rosa Melendez, 25, filed the case in the Sri Lankan court on Jan.30 and although it will take up to three weeks before it first appears in court, the judge handling the case "disposes a positive attitude towards her," said Lotis Reyes-Ocasio, co-ordinator of the Third World Woman's Program at the Everywoman's Center at UMass.

Melendez was awarded custody of her daughters, Klara, 6 and Nina, 3, when she and Charles Ranasinghe, 28 were legally divorced on Nov. 20. Their six-year old marriage ended due to Ranasinghe's "cruel and abusive treatment" toward Melendez.

After the case appears in court, Ranasinghe has the option to delay the process by filing an objection, either by asking for an extension or by claiming to be ill and unable to appear in court.

If an objection is filed, an inquiry will follow and a decision will not be made for another month.

Melendez's attorneys, B.J. Fernando, a former Sri Lankan ambassador to the United States and his partner Romeish De Silva, are soliciting funds to continue the case.

"Money should not be what doesn't let the case be successful when things appear to be so positive," Reyes-Ocasio said.

Reyes-Ocasio said that if 500 people go without lunch for a day, which on the average costs $3 per person, they could reach their goal of $5,500. Presently, the Melendez fund has only received $665.

The money will be air fare for Melendez and the children as well as for attorney's fees.

"There's something we can do as a community," said Reyes-Ocasio, adding that writing to Melendez would help alleviate her sorrows and feelings of loneliness. "(A letter is) what keeps prisoners there, that is what keeps people there," said Reyes-Ocasio. Anyone interested in writing Melendez or donating money can call Reyes-Ocasio at 545-0883.

Bonnie Mann, Melendez's counselor at Northampton's Neccessities-Necesidades, who is in Sri Lanka with her, said in a telephone interview that Melendez is "comfortable" in the island country off the southern tip of India because she has lived there. But, "it is really difficult" for Melendez because she is concerned about missing school.

But Mann added that Melendez is determined to stay until the case is resolved, which may take up to three months and she can return to Amherst with her daughters.

The girls are with their grandparents, who have been very supportive to Melendez, Mann said. Her ex-in-laws have also been very reasonable in letting Melendez see the children. But Ranasinghe has threatened to refuse visitation rights, Mann said, and has also threatened Melendez's life.

The girls are "physically okay, but they are not attending school." Mann added that Klara has re-developed an old behavioral problem, acting very aggressively with her sister and showing periods of anger and sadness without provocation.

Melendez said the girls "fear she won't be with them." Her main concerns are the success of the legal case and the children-Klara's problem and the fact that they are not in school.

Melendez, who lives in the capital city of Colombo, has found employment as a tourist guide.

Black History

By KIMBERLY A. BURGE
Collegian Staff

As part of Black History Month, Black Affairs will have a series highlighting the achievements and accomplishments of Black men and women who have, in our context excelled in history.

Mary McLeod Bethune devoted her life to bringing dignity, opportunity and hope to Black Americans. She became a teacher, the builder of a school, a public speaker and a governmental administrator.

Mrs. Bethune started a school for women in the Daytona Beach, Florida area with only $1.50 in her pocket. She earned money for this school over the years by doing many different jobs. In 1923, the Bethune School joined with the Cookman Institue, to become Bethune-Cookman College.

President Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed Bethune to serve as the Director of the Negro Affairs Division of the National Youth Administration. Both President and Mrs. Roosevelt were great admirers of Bethune.

South Africans need our support

The headlines of the past few months have been dominated by the protesters who are rightly upset with the political conditions in South Africa. Every day we can see prominent American politicians receiving generous amounts of media attention as they are arrested in front of the South African Embassy in Washington D.C. Indeed, any ardent supporter of representative democracy should be outraged by South Africa's racist policies; but, at the same time, we should not recommend ill-conceived "reforms" that would force the white South African government to isolate itself from Western pressure and militarily barricade itself in Pretoria. In short, revolution is not needed nor should it be advocated; what South Africa needs is progressively peaceful change while remaining a strong Western ally.

Peter Dow

The American people, Bishop Tutu, the SADC and the rest of the world should understand that black South Africans, despite their oppression, enjoy a level of economic and physical well-being virtually unmatched by blacks in any other African nation; and this fact is crucial. While basic human subsistence and survival alone cannot compensate for the actions of a racist society, they are the only basis for real human reform. By this standard of human survival alone, South Africa is utopian, compared with all other African and Third World governments. As statistics on 58 major nations reported by the Population Reference Bureau show, the greatest national rise in life expectancy from 1975 to 1983 was in South Africa, which increased life expectancy by nine years; this was nearly 50 percent more than the world as a whole in this period.

Indeed, the Reagan administration's policy of "constructive engagement" has brought real, irreversible change. In 1983, white South African voters approved a new constitution that gave "colored" and Indian representatives each a new chamber in Parliament. Black trade unions have been legalized, are gaining membership and strength, and will, no doubt, soon be a powerful political force. The Botha government has accepted the permanence of blacks resident in urban areas and is supporting black business there.

In addition, South Africa is making notable strides in educational improvements. Their 1985 budget currently includes 23 percent more money for education, which is the biggest increase of any budget item. Outlays for black education are rising twice as fast as those for white, and it is obvious that if this trend continues, white education will eventually decline in real terms.

But what if, despite these concrete examples of changing conditions, the present protestations succeed in forcing American companies to divest from South Africa? How will the black population be affected? (It is interesting to note here that many of the critics of Reagan's constructive engagement policy with Pretoria have also condemned the administration for not taking a more "friendly" approach to the Soviet Union, which, with its gulags and slave labor and rampant anti-Semitic government policies, falls far short of South Africa in its application of democratic principles).

Upon investigation, it appears that the threats of sanctions and divestment may backfire. First, such measures aren't likely to inflict much pain on the ruling white minority, just the blacks who receive the benefits of employment. Secondly, if the U.S. companies are forced to terminate their operations, many of their plants and facilities quickly would be purchased by eager British, West German and Japanese competitors. Thirdly, many American companies have signed the Sullivan Principles, and pledged to abolish workplace segregation, follow equal pay and work practices, train black and mixed race workers and improve housing, schooling, and other facilities for their employees. Companies have been closely monitored for compliance with the Sullivan Principles, and as a result, the Principles have had a catalytic effect on the Botha government.

Another example of South African support for American companies came during Ted Kennedy's recent excursion to that country. The leader of South Africa's largest tribe, Chief Gatsha Buthelezi of the Zulus, lashed out at the illustrious senator's support for divestiture, calling this notion "madness" from the point of view of African blacks. All the while, blacks and whites chanted "Go Home Kennedy."

In short, let us not rashly hurry into an unwise abandonment of the Botha government, with the probable result being the rise to power of the Marxist African National Congress or some faction thereof. What we should demand instead is a rational policy of constructive progress to dismantle apartheid, while promoting democratic capitalism for the greatest benefit of the majority black population.

"Would you be content to...?"

When Ann Landers released results of her "bedroom poll," the country quickly turned its attention to sex. Women across the country responded to Landers' survey saying "yes" they would give up the "act" for tenderness and hugging, sparking a national debate on the question itself and what exactly the results mean.

Collegian reporters Heather Hanlon, Nancy A. Bukar, Laura Yee, Anne McCrory and Rita Murphy passed out surveys around campus and 124 people responded. While the results themselves are not statistically significant, nor do they represent a large majority, are based on a question which in itself is misleading, there were 124 people who felt strongly enough to respond. Below are some of the comments from the respondents.

	Yes	No	Both
Male	28	20	7
Female	42	22	5
Totals	70	42	12

"Would you be content to be held close and treated tenderly, and forget about 'the act?'"

Male: All people need attention and affection...however, to compare a sexual need to acts of affection and closeness is ludicrous.

Male: Being held close and tender is a very large part of the process, but what is the process without the end result?

Female: No, because I enjoy the "act" very much and would have become a nun if I agreed with this statement.

Male: I want to hold her close and treat her tenderly then do "the act" until we pass out.

Male: Of course, it depends who's doing the holding. With Nastassja Kinski, being treated tenderly simply wouldn't be adequate. (sheep too).

Female: Yes I wouldn't mind that and it would be nice once in while (like when I'm tired) but I also like to do it.

Female: Is it okay for virgins to answer this?

Female: If more people reached out, maybe more people would stay together.

Female: It is the emotional closeness that counts, not the animal act.

Male: I would be content but on the other hand I do rather enjoy having sex.

Male: I'm saving sex for marriage.

Male: The essence of "the act" like that of many other human "acts" is illusionary. Tenderness is one of the few band-aids we have in this absurd world.

Female: You mean I should enjoy fooling around without getting laid?

Female: I expect the former with the latter, unless both my partner and I agree differently. Moreover, one never has to worry about the former when sleeping with a member of the same sex.

Male: I feel that being close and treated tenderly is a lead into the act in much the same way going to the beach leads to swimming.

Female: Both are very important but the love and tenderness come first.

Male: What's the act? I don't get it.

Male: Is this a permanent condition?

Female: If I hear anyone else ask this stupid question, I really think I'm going to get sick and die before I've ever even done "the act."

Male: The act is everything.

GEE, I REALLY CAN'T DECIDE WHETHER I LIKE THE ACT OR THE HUGGING & KISSING.

Reagan budget a 'scandal'

Rob Ginocchio

Reagan's budget proposal for fiscal year 1986 is a complete outrage. While it requests a 6 percent increase in military expenditures, social programs face severe cutbacks which will undoubtedly have a startling effect on Americans who lie within the low to moderate income bracket.

The proposed budget is the result of the president's promise to avoid a tax increase as a means of reducing the current deficit. However, it should be quite evident that the skyrocketing deficit is not the result of federally sponsored welfare programs but rather massive escalations in military hardware—thus the paradox.

Reagan along with Weinberger and the military have clearly turned their backs on the needs of the American people and focused their attention on an over-priced, over-stocked military arsenal with infininte growth potential.

A large portion of the requested defense budget will go towards scientific research on the "Star Wars" anti-missile defense system. Such research and development will cost astronomical sums of money and it is highly unlikely to prove fully effective if completed. A prolonged militarization plan will not only cause the deficit to continue its upward swing but will even widen the gap between U.S.-Soviet arms negotiations.

Cutbacks and freezes on social programs threatens small businessmen, farmers, the poor, the elderly and college students. Under the Constitution, Americans are entitled to basic human needs such as shelter, decent medical care and an education. Reagan is violating the constitutional rights of certain individuals by depriving them of basic necessities.

Although the budget proposals face many revisions in Congress, Weinberger has been hurling pro-military propaganda at congressional members and the American public in a desperate attempt to gain support. Surprisingly enough, the proposed budget has been attacked not only by fellow Republicans, but also by Budget Director David Stockman who has called it "a scandal."

Letters to the Editor

Today's student must carry on the challenge

This letter is in response to columnist Diane Lane's scathing rebuke of the '60s generation for failing to carry the banner of social revolution into the current decade for her. Amidst a plethora of emotionally charged rhetoric and meaningless cliche (Yuppies, rats/sinking ship, etc.) she skillfully avoids the central issue—that the responsibility for social change is now with her own "middle" generation, which has found neither the time nor the desire to make any sort of impact whatsoever on national policy.

I was a freshman at UMass in the spring of 1970, during which the University was closed down by students in protest of the Vietnam atrocity and the murders at Kent State. I was among thousands of demonstrators in Washington, D.C., who faced loaded rifles to bring about an end to the senseless Vietnam War. These are things we did for ourselves and our country. Unlike Lane and her contemporaries we did not sit idly by for "lack of an outlet" or wait to be shown the way, or even avoid the battle for fear our efforts would be in vain.

The spineless posture which Lane assumes in denigrating the '60s generation for not showing her the way to her own peace of mind is typical of college students today who seem devoid of character and almost incapable of original thought. It is a mystery to me why the current undergraduate population of the United States feels no personal obligation to challenge in a meaningful way the policies which dictate nuclear arms buildup, poverty and oppression. The impetus for these movements must come from the intellectual community, which has enormous power by virtue of the fact that they have nothing to lose—except perhaps the prospects of a six-figure salary (heaven forbid).

Phi Sig blamed...

I have reserved my comments about the annual stereotyping, anti-fraternity letters for four years. Unfortunately, I can censor myself no longer, because I feel that a serious injustice has been committed against Phi Sigma Kappa.

My remarks are directed at Karen Pollens' letter in Monday's Collegian. My problem with the letter is that Pollens neglected to take a closer look: a closer look at the situation and a closer look at Phi Sigma Kappa itself.

Phi Sigma Kappa was not having a gathering on the balcony Thursday night. No one was on the balcony (it was 18°), and no remarks were directed at her or any other student or passerby. I realize that because of Phi Sig's location and the mere fact that it is a fraternity it is a convenient scapegoat. If there were comments made that night, Phi Sig was not the source.

I also wish Pollens would take a closer look at Phi Sigma Kappa itself, and the principles they pride themselves on; the promotion of brotherhood, the stimulation of scholarship and the development of character. The innate ability to abuse or humiliate another human being is not a criterion for admission.

Although these opinions are my own, I am proud to be associated with Phi Sigma Kappa. When I graduate I will hold on to the principles that Phi Sig has taught me, as well as the friendships I have made and the memories I will cherish. These memories will never be tarnished by the tunnel-vision of individuals who only criticize rather than make the effort to participate or understand.

I share Pollens' hope that the people who made the remarks see her letter and feel ashamed. I also hope that Pollens will realize that these people and Phi Sig are not one and the same. Pollens should also recognize that Phi Sig has been unfairly slandered, and all they can feel is alienated and deserving of an apology.

Kyle W.J. Cooper
Amherst

...for others' actions

As a member of Phi Sigma Kappa Fraternity, I would like to respond to a letter written by Karen Pollens which appeared in Monday's Collegian. In the letter, she tells of a rather distasteful display by some fraternity members as she passed by them on Thursday night. Pollens goes on to name Phi Sigma Kappa as the offending fraternity. After some investigation by Greek Area officials and members of our own house, it has been found that the fraternity to blame was not Phi Sig, rather, it was our neighbor. Phi Sig has worked hard in past years to improve on the false stereotype which many fraternities suffer from. While we deplore sexual harassment in any form, our only aim is to have our good name cleared with the same publicity by which it has been besmirched.

Just sing, sing a song

Elizabeth A. Luciano

Two sharp drumbeats and suddenly the stage lights up, a dry-ice mist rising from it. The floodlights are red and yellow. The crowd goes crazy, chanting and cheering. You navigate your way through the haze and step up to the mike, adjusting it. The soldout stadium literally roars as you blast into the first set.

You're a performer; a sparkling pop music phenomenon wrapped up in leather, right?

Wrong.

Chances are you're a closet lip-syncher and you're in the privacy of your own home. You pluck intricate progressions on an "air" guitar and dance and strut better than "Mick and the Boys." You've got class. You've got style. You've got, as they say, all the right moves.

You just can't sing.

The living room serves as a stadium. A hairbrush becomes the microphone and a hockey stick is the guitar. There is no crowd, no multi-colored laser-light show. There is just you, plugged into a Sony Walkman.

I admit it. Do you?

Granted this secret isn't divulged lightly. In our goat-cheese-and-granola worshipping society, lip-synching has a sleazy image. It's not blatantly obnoxious, like sneezing on someone. Lip-synching is more like buying books about Princess Diana. It is something a self-respecting adult simply does not admit to.

Kids can get away with it. Sure. Moonwalking on the sixth-grade playground is not only encouraged, it's practically mandatory. You can be left back a year, socially if not academically, for flunking moonwalking. But like baseball cards and Barbie dolls, dancing around the living room is eventually outgrown. Usually.

Lip-synchers' musical tastes often match their maturity levels. Like most lip-synchers, I judge a song not by its actual quality, but by how well it can be performed. "Ghostbusters" is a classic tune. "As Time Goes By" is not. Anything by Tina Turner or Jerry Lee Lewis is fabulous; anything by Bing Crosby isn't. You get the picture.

Contrary to popular belief, lip-synching is not confined to the Great Indoors. Every weekday, countless commuters "plug in" on their way to and from work. If you watch for that tell-tale twitching of the lips, chances are you'll find a lip-syncher or two.

Lip-synching is not without its financial rewards. Many area nightclubs offer patrons the chance to show off their synching abilities, with cash prizes that hover around the $100-mark.

And some would-be stars have even set down their hairbrush mikes and hockey-stick guitars to turn professional. Within the last three years Boston's Copy Kittens and Great Pretenders have gone from unknowns to heavily-booked bands that rake in $1000-plus a week.

And to people like me, who still like to sing into hairbrushes, that's really something to sing about.

'Mellowing out' is not what Kinks are doing

Peter Wissoker's review, "Kinks mellow out" (Jan. 20) contains a number of fallacies which bother me. Although I do not doubt that Wissoker attended the concert, his review and comments on the Kinks remind me of a series of articles I have read recently by people who do not know what they are talking about. The most notable among these are the almost universal pannings of the movie Dune as being "too confusing" by critics who obviously had not read the book. Like the Dune reviewers, Wissoker has not done his homework.

First of all, I would like to point out that the Kinks are by no means "mellowing out." The last three albums released by the Kinks, Word of Mouth, State of Confusion, and Give the People What They Want are examples of the hardest rock the group has ever produced. This is especially true when compared with the deep, reflective Ray Davies' compositions in Kinks' folk and rock opera albums of the early '70s and the pastoral quietude of the late '60s concept albums like The Village Green Preservation Society.

The Kinks have not toured with a horn section since the Schoolboys in Disgrace tour of 1976 (the last of their rock opera productions), although Wissoker feels that it was newly missing. Another question which bothers me is: How can Dave Davies steal guitar licks from Pete Townsend's "Shakin' All Over," a song Townsend did not write? The similarities between the blues riffs of F. Heath's song are not a "shameless act...a ripoff" but structurally determined as are similarities between the riffs of "Catch Me Now I'm Falling" and the Rolling Stone's "Jumpin' Jack Flash." There are definite chordal differences.

Wissoker's panning of Tommy Shaw does not surprise me. Collegian Arts reviewers regularly condemn groups like Styx, AC-DC, Journey, etc. because they are, as they inevitably put it, "too cliche." At the risk of sounding cliche myself, I suggest that a concert review hinged on one term which has become cliched in itself is a cop-out. The use of the word "cliche" by Arts reviewers has become, as Wissoker has put it, "a shameless act" of journalism. Which is a shame because they have some potential.

Suicides up expert says

BOSTON (AP) - The United States is in "the midst of an international suicide epidemic" among young people, primarily in the open spaces of the west, where a deeper sense of loneliness and isolation may move youngsters to kill themselves, says the president of the American Association of Suicidology (AAS).

Suicides among Americans 15 to 24 years of age rose 136 percent between 1960 and 1980, the last year for which complete statistics were available, Pamela Cantor said in an interview Tuesday night.

A clinical psychologist, Cantor, 40, becomes AAS president in April at the association's Toronto annual meeting.

The organization promotes research on causes and treatment, sponsors National Suicide Prevention Week and has about 800 members, including physicians, therapists, researchers, social workers and suicide survivors.

"In 1960, the suicide rate for the age group was 5.2 per 100,000 young people," she said following a panel discussion in the Boston public library on teenage suicide.

"In 1980, the rate was 12.3 percent. One in every five suicides in 1980 involved victims in the 15-24-year age group. The suicide rate among adolescents has doubled in a generation."

"We have done a good job in reducing mortality in all age groups except teenagers. Suicide is the third leading cause of death in that age group."

"The rise in teenage suicide primarily is in the West. That may be because the western states are expanding, there is isolation. In the West, there is too much space, and there are not enough people."

She said loneliness and a feeling no one cares about them seems to drive the young to suicide.

Cantor, who practices in the Boston suburb of Newton, said she did not have complete figures or a geographical breakdown on teenage suicides.

She said 1984 suicide rates among the general population reflect the western trend.

Nevada led the country with a rate of 29 per 100,000 population, the Rocky Mountain states' group rate was 17.4, California's rate is 15.2.

Massachusetts, she said, had a rate of 7.8 percent, third only to Mississippi with 8.7.

Teachers protest covers

SUDBURY, Mass. (AP) - Two history teachers, contending book covers distributed in high schools by the National Guard glorify the military, are offering an alternative jacket showing Guardsmen firing on students at Kent State University in 1970.

The 1,400 students at Lincoln-Sudbury Regional High School in this affluent suburb west of Boston can choose between the two covers when they visit the school library.

"Guardsmen are trained to kill, but the Guard's book covers don't state that," said teacher William Schechter, 38. "The Guard's covers attempt to entice people into military service by showing the glory of going to battle.

"I don't think 17-year-old kids should be manipulated into joining the military unthinkingly," he said. "If, after reflection, a kid decides this is what he wants to do, more power to him."

A National Guard spokesman called the teacher's attitude "a little bit out of date."

"We think we are a positive organization with a positive mission and I think we're perceived by people in the main that way today," Col. John Carlson, public relations director for the Guard in Massachusetts, said yesterday.

ARTS

A new wave masterpiece

By JON STRYMISH
Collegian Staff

Stranger Than Paradise, the new entry into the recently-discovered youth spaceman market, as in Repo Man and Liquid Sky, opened Wednesday at the Pleasant St. Theater. It's a black and white, deadpan humour of three existential teenager's who move against the bleakest possible background of America, not quite realizing that they are only symbols. Willie, Edie and Eva are like low bugdet comedians out of the period of the Marx brothers, Laurel and Hardy or maybe The Twilight Zone.

Willie (John Lurie) is an immigrant of ten years from Hungary who hasn't lost the bleak outlook of his native country while picking up the aesthetic values of Brooklyn.

Eva, his sixteen year old cousin, beautiful, bright and stylishly punk, arrives from the old country and they are forced to spend ten day together against both their wills. They are both mean to eachother.

Eddy on the other hand is Willie's wimpy friend, who looks up to Willie and wants to sleep with Eva even though she wouldn't look at him if her life depended on it. A year after Eva has left for Cleveland, he still remembers her as the most exciting thing that has ever happened to them so he suggests that they go to visit her.

The boys head off the Cleveland in a car borrowed from Eddie's cousin. Along the way they realize that no matter where you go, "It all looks the same." In Cleveland, they do things like sit between Eva and her date at the movies.

Since the boys still have money left and don't realize that Eva's not especially impressed by taem, they decide to take her

by Peter Wissoker

As usual the myth that there is no homework at the beginning of the semester is dying at an amazingly quick rate. Yet there is more and more stuff to do at night.

First and foremost on my list is the new space shuttle pinball game. More about that later.

Next is to go see Circle in the Hatch on Saturday night. They're a local band and really worth checking out. This is an unsolicited plug and they are free. Go Children Slow are at the Hatch tonight. They too are local and free. Don't complain if there is no local scene if you never go to what there is.

In the more well-known vein, The Fools are playing at the Blue Wall tonight. The Stompers are playing Saturday night.

During the breaks between sets you really should check out that pinball game. Instead of half-naked women it gives you a picture of the space shuttle and when you get the ball into the shuttle it says "5-4-3-2-1" and the ball comes out and lots of lights zing and stuff, but periodically it goes "5-4-3-2-1, mission aborted." Ha Ha just like the real thing. Great, huh.

Friday night Rapmasters Run D.M.C. and Dr. Jeckyll and Mr. Hyde will be rapping and demonstrating the DJ techniques which separate Masters from the also spans. Then there's all kinds of stuff in Northampton, in the next paragraph.

Tonight Gatemouth Brown and Vassar Clements will be playing at Pearl Street. Clements is one of the best blues/folk/country or shall we say Bluegrass fiddlers around. Tomorrow night Rapture of the Deep and Slang Syndrome will be playing at Sheehan's. Sunday offers some cultural entertainment as master guitarists Ralph Towner and John Ambercrombie perform two shows at the Iron Horse and pianist Steven Shoenberg performs avec film at Sage Hall at the Smith College campus. Also on Sunday, in another culture, is Lao Tse and the Entropics at the New Studio, also in Northampton.

This column gets kinda dry, huh? It depends on your excitement at the bands which are coming to maintain your interest. So hold on, Johnathan Richman is coming to the Iron Horse Monday night. He'll either be great or embarassing but it should be entertaining either way. Comedian Steve Wright is coming to the Iron Horse on Wednesday. Nothing like hearing them say "So, you'll be in Northampton Massachusetts next week" on the Johnny Carson show. Really it happened. I'm not sure they knew where it was, but it should be funny.

And finally the Godfather of soul, master crowd manipulator (you'll be amazed at how many times you can yell his name and not feel stupid), yes, James Brown is coming to Pearl Street for two shows. One last thing before the Trivia question. Rockabillyites Kristi Rose and the Midnight Walkers will be at the Zone Saturday night.

The epic master strikes back
A passage to perfectionism

By JIM TAYLOR
Collegian Staff

Sir David Lean has made his contribution to art and is aptly nicknamed the master of the epic. He retains his title after a fourteen year leave with the sprawling adaptation of E.M. Forster's "Passage to India." Lean not only directed, but also wrote the screenplay and edited the film.

His control over every aspect of his films makes one wonder if an auteur can still exist in this age of studio control.

Passage to India opens with the arrival of Mrs. Moore (Peggy Asheroft) and her daughter from a second marriage, Adela Quested (Judy Davis). They plan to visit Mrs. Moore's son from the first marriage and Adela's fiancee, Ronny Heaslop (Nigel Havers). Heaslop has become the court magistrate of Chandropore, a fictitious city created by Forster. The actual location was shot at Bangalore. They soon discover the divided lifestyles of the English and the Indians. When Mrs. Moore askes why the two nationalaties don't mingle, the diplomat's wife answers, "It's a question of culture."

Lean does a great job at satiring the aristocracy while simultaneously commenting on the problems with the British reign during 1928. He addresses the social problems without ever getting ridiculously soapy. When the two tourists want to see the 'real' India, they are allowed to meet Dr. Aziz (Victor Banerjee) and Professor Godbole (Sir Alec Guinness). Guinness adds fabulous comic relief through his use of satirical philosophy. Dr. Aziz wants to become part of the English race, believing they are the superior culture. When he accidentally invites Mrs. Moore and Miss Quested to his home, he realizes that he has made a mistake. Instead, he suggests a trip in the hills outside Chandrapore.

The trip is destined to disaster from the start. For the beautiful Marabar Caves, Lean chose the granite cliffs at Ramanagaram and Savandurga. The spectacular locations often dominate the screen, but work well against the compressing psychological situations.

The unifying force in this story is the psychological dilemmas that the major characters undergo. The major conflict lies in Miss Quested coming in terms with herself and her marriage. Like Mrs. Moore, she is married to a way of life that can not be altered without sacrifice. This struggle is wonderfully symbolized in a scene in which baboons crawl over an ancient Indian ruin and prepare to attack Miss Quested.

Every cinematographer of a Lean motion picture since The Bridge Over the River Kwai has won an academy award. Ernest Day (veteran James Bond second-unit director) seems to be this year's choice. The photography becomes nostalgic at times, showing off the beautiful scenery. This is needed, however, to complete the reversal in tone towards the latter half of the film.

The pacing of the film is extraordinary, especially in the first half hour. A series of atmospheric and meaningful dissolves add much to the final impression of the film. Maurice Jarre's musical score is excellent, portraying the emotional state of the characters and the environment of India. Jarre has worked on numerous Lean pictures. Production designer John Box constructs fine detail to the Indian culture, no matter how unrealistic it may seem to some viewers. The contrasts between the ways in life are clearly substantiated.

Lean knows how to use the technology of art to fulfill the final impact of his films. Like his earlier films, sound is a major element, but I think it is used best in Passage to India. I can not remember a better use of the pattering of rain in any film, then on the overhead window during Aziz's trial.

The performances are outstanding for the entire cast. It is hard to make judgements on such a tight, professional ensemble. Peggy Ashcroft stands to win a few best actress awards.

Passage to India is a perfect example of how each element of a film can contribute to the final effect. It is really good to see an old master still works towards his egocentrical perfection against the contemporary assembly line productions. Sir David Lean, along with John Ford, is a favorite director among many Hollywood filmmakers. He has faithfully adapted Forster's novel and added another masterpiece to his own collection of works.

Judy Davis and Victor Banerjec star in David Lean's A Passage to India

Eva (Eszler Balint) shows her visitors Willie and Eddie (John Lurie, Richard Edson) a vision of heaven in Stranger Than Paradise

to Florida, or Paradise. From there on their relationship dissolves into cruelty but Eva is resigned to it because she hasn't seen much better out of America yet.

She sits around as she always has, smoking Chesterfields and listening to "I Put A Spell On You" by Screaming Jay Hawkins and feeling frustrated. Finally in one very spaced out but satisfying ending she manages to send all the characters to their deserved fates.

It's amazing how far a Hungarian accent will go towards making anything funny. When Willie complains about Eva's music, she says, "That's Screaming Jay Hawkins and you better like him because he's a wild man. This could be an obnoxious command, but instead it is a deep truth and a memorable line. Aunt Lotte, whom Eva lives with in Cleveland, talks almost exclusively in Hungarian and she's even funnier.

Director Jim Jarmusch, only thirty and on his second producing job, shaped the film by using a very long, uncut take for each scene. He gives the film a nervous fast paced energy which is hilarious, making Stranger Than Paradise at least the coolest movie of this year.

The nation's newest General, Boston College quarterback Doug Flutie works out in his first pro practice.

Flutie falls in as a General

ORLANDO, FLAla, (AP) - Heisman Trophy winner Doug Flutie, "nervous and overthrowing the ball," took the practice field for the New Jersey Generals for the first time yesterday to begin earning his $7 million salary with the U.S. Football League team.

"It wasn't too bad...I felt comfortable out there considering the layoff," said Flutie, who arrived at the Generals' training camp Tuesday night and met most of his new teammates just minutes before taking the field for a light morning workout at the University of Central Florida.

Pro football's newest glamour boy got a good reception from Walt Michaels, his new coach; and the man he's expected to beat out of a job, 14-year pro quarterback Brian Sipe.

"He's a poised kid, obviously talented," said Sipe, in his second year as field boss for the Generals after a dozen years in the National Football League.

★ Cutbacks

complained about it being cut. I asked athletes from other sports what they felt, and ony tennis team members were really upset enough to do something. I don't think, because of limited numbers and other reasons, that others teams could do anything."

"Tennis is a sport for life, unlike football," he said. "It's important and the athletic administration doesn't realize that we have beaten, teams with full scholarships like BU and BC. They don't know what's going on."

The meeting is scheduled for the middle of the month and Sommerstein, who will graduate this year and can't help, himself, isn't sure his request will be honored.

"I hope they realize what's happening and stop the moves," he said. "Or maybe the school will continue to be blind to the minor sports. It's a shame."

Ski teams dominate:
Men, behind Conway, in first

Despite a shoulder injury earlier this season, University of Massachusetts skiier Dan Conway has proven that he is one of the top competitors in the Eastern Collegiate Ski Association. This past weekend at Cannon Mountain, Conway won both the slalom and giant slalom races. Conway's performance keeps the Minutemen in the league's number one spot for another week.

In Saturday's slalom, the UM men won easily, placing four racers in the top six. Conway was first off the hill with a time of 90.33 seconds, followed by Bob Faigel (2nd), Craig McCordie (5th), and Jonathan Segal (6th). Also skiing fast for UMass was Andy Clarke (18th) and Kris Vanderclown (19th). Taking second place in the race was Boston College.

Lately, the giant slalom has been a tough event for the UMass men to ski well.

Sunday, UM placed second, just behind Boston College despite taking the number one and number two spots. Conway won, followed by teammate Segal in second. Third off the hill for Umass and sixth overall was Clarke. McCordic, Matt Luczkow, and Al Taupier finished 11th, 18th, and 34th respectively.

Next weekend, the UM skiers travel to the Brown University tournament at Loon Mountain in New Hampshire.

• Women also pace conference

After three weekends of intense slalom and giant slalom competition, the University of Massachusetts women's ski team is still solidly in first place in the Womens Intercollegiate Ski Conference.

The Minutewomen lead the league with 29 points, followed by Plymouth State College with 22 points. Boston College, Brown University, Smith College, and Amherst College all follow.

This past Saturday at Cannon Mountain, the UMass women had to settle for second place in the slalom. Plymouth State College took first place with a total team time of 319.42 seconds. BC's Laura Hourihan finished first, followed by UM's captain, Sue White (2nd). Also steady in the gates for UMass was Colleen Sweeney (9th), Julia Wells (12th), Sue Levy (13th), and Kara Mullen (16th).

In Sunday's giant slalom, UMass bounced back from their previous defeat to win the race by five seconds over Plymouth. Kathy Smiley of UM was her first race by with a time of 73.77 seconds. Hourihan of BC was next with 74.01 seconds. Sweeney placed third followed by UM's Lisa Luczkow.

Sports Log

Tony Botros

Just a few thoughts...

College basketball, especially the Big East, is proving to be more exciting than ever. The Boston Garden was the scene for the latest encounter as Boston College edged Syracuse with two clutch free throws by Michael Adams...What was really questionable was Adams being at the line in the first place. That was extremely close to a charge and perhaps should have been a no call. That could have been the result of the infamous home-court advantage...Remember last week, when Syracuse's fans threw oranges while Pat Ewing was at the free throw line? Now that's the difference between the two schools. Not once did I see a BC fan throw an Eagle.

Speaking of Boston College, I feel sorry for the BC seniors. For four years they were looking to walk down the graduation aisle with Doug Whats-his-name with "Pomp and Circumstance" in the background. But while the class of 85 get their diplomas, Flutie will be in the midst of his first pro season with the New Jersey Generals...It looks like Doug will wear his Mortar Board with the class of 86, so its not too late to get out those transfer applications.

This Sunday marks the NBA All-Star game but maybe even more entertaining will be the Slam-Dunk competition. Last year, the Phoenix Suns' Larry Nance edged out Julius Erving to win it. This year looks to be even more exciting with the presence of one Michael Jordan, who goes to the hoop with a jam more than a D.C. patron goes to the bathroom...This year, look for Jordan to edge out Dominique Wilkins for the title, with Larry Nance finishing a close third...As for the Doctor, he'll be too busy getting his degree from University Without Walls to win it.

Another superstar is looking towards a different profession. Four-time Olympic gold medalist Carl Lewis will compete in a track meet in New York this weekend. He is not only going to run, he's also going to sing the National Anthem...He may not be the next Michael Jackson, but he could probably beat Michael out in the 100-Meter moonwalk...Turning to another summertime sport, Baseball Commissioner Peter Uberoth is still fighting to get lights installed at Wrigley Field. The Cub fans, of course, want to skip work and catch a ball game. Just think of the city of Chicago as your 1:25 Food Science class. It's something that you have to cut at least once in a while.

More baseball: The New York Mets still have not yet signed Rookie of the Year Dwight Gooden, who is asking for a large sum. The Mets are willing to give Dwight about half-a-million but he's holding out for more. Now that's American...Finally, the latest rumor sweeping the country is that wrestling commentator Vince McMahon is one of those masked wrestlers from "parts unknown".

No more need be said.

Minutemen look to even out at Bonnie

Start important road swing tonight in NY

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

The most important stretch in the season starts tonight for the University of Massachusetts as they kick off a three-game road trip at St. Bonaventure.

The Minutemen, 9-10 overall and 5-5 (fifth place) in the Atlantic 10, have to take two-out-of-three games to entertain any thoughts of finishing in the upper half of the league, a goal both the players and coach Ron Gerlufsen feel is realistic.

"The road games mean a lot to us," the coach said. "We haven't won at St. Bonnie and we've beaten them already this season, so getting to .500 on the season and sweeping them would be a good accomplishment for us."

The Minutemen administered a 69-53 beating to the Bonnies on January 19 in the Springfield Civic Center behind 23 Horace Neysmith points.

Neysmith will be the key again with high-scoring Bonnie center Barry Mungar still slowed by a back injury. He may not play and in his absence Neysmith hopes to rule the inside.

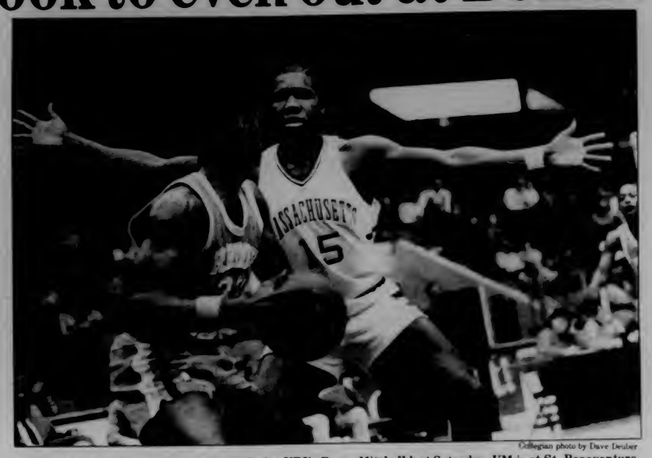
"I don't really care if he's there or not, I did pretty well without him, but I think I could do well with him," the UM co-captain said. "All I know is that we need the win."

UMass, who beat Rhode Island 76-65 in its last outing on Saturday, realize they have to play together and with intensity to continue winning.

"We're not that good that we can afford to slack off at any time," Gerlufsen said. "If we play hard for 40 minutes, we'll do well, probably win. I'd like to stay with the same things we did last time to beat them, good defense and a patient offense."

UMass took a 38-14 halftime lead on the Bonnies in Springfield, holding them to 2-of-12 shooting in the first minutes to take a big lead that never evaporated. Donald Russell had 16 and Carl Smith ten in a game that saw all 14 Minutemen see action and ten score.

"It was a good win," Smith said. "But it means they'll be looking to pay us back and we have to watch for that."



Collegian photo by Dave Deuber

UMass forward Horace Neysmith (15) denies URI's Bryan Mitchell last Saturday. UM is at St. Bonaventure tonight.

St. Bonaventure, 3-6 in the league and 9-9 overall, almost beat top-ranked St. John's earlier this season, but have slumped with Mungar's injury.

The main threat is forward Rob Samuels who had 19 against UMass, point guard Alvin Lott is the offensive key and was held to no points and one assist by Smith in January.

UMass goes on the road to Penn State and St. Joseph's after leaving the Bonnies. They return home to face league powers George Washington, West Virginia and Temple and must have a good attitude coming into those games.

"Obviously we are looking to those, but we know we can't look past anybody on the road." Smith said. "We owe these teams from past years and it's time to pay them back."

The Minutemen will also be looking for Russell to snap out of his shooting slump, the 6-1 senior has scored just 25 points in the last three games, far from his 15.6 average.

Other keys will be the play of Bobby Braun and Lorenzo Sutton, the other starters. Braun has 38 rebounds in his last three games while Sutton has regained his touch with 18 points in the last two contests.

The first player of the bench? Depending on the situation Tom Emerson, Jackie Sheehan, Matt Ryan or Darryl Carter will see the first sub time.

The sports cutbacks:

How one athlete deals with it . . .

By GERRY deSIMAS

It's been a tough year for the University of Massachusetts wrestling team. In its last year, the Minutemen have had to struggle with small numbers and a limited schedule.

And for NCAA participant, sophomore Chris Lee, it's also been a tough season.

Last year, as a freshman, Lee posted 20 wins, won the New England championship at 126 pounds and made it to the first round of the NCAA tournament.

This year, despite winning the MIT tournament, Lee who was ranked 10th in the country earlier in the season, hasn't wrestled all that well and he's the first to admit it.

"I should be doing better," he said. "I'm not doing as well as I should be." Lee, thus far, has posted a 5-5 mark.

"The main problem is training," coach Richard Freitas said. "When he's good, he can beat anyone in New England at 126. He's just isn't getting the competition he needs (due to a lack of meets)."

The wrestling program was one of seven varsity sports that were cut from the athletic budget last May. They were re-instated by the trustees for two years over the summer.

Wrestling, though will end its varsity program this spring.

"It's been difficult," Freitas said, "with half a schedule and a lack of numbers to practice. The attitude has been totally destroyed."

In practice, Lee has to grapple with the bigger wrestlers and he can't work his moves the way he needs to.

And the Minutemen don't have enough meets to keep them fresh. "It's tough to wrestle a month between meets," Lee said. The Minutemen wrestled just twice over January this year. UMass, 1-16 a year ago, is presently 1-4.

Wrestler Chris Lee hopes to recover the form that took him to the Nationals.

But Lee and Freitas aren't willing to throw in the towel. "Basically, we're getting ready for the conference tourney and hopefully make the Nationals (NCAA's)," Freitas said. The New England Division I championships are March 1-3 at Maine.

"Chris will have to pick up his training and get ready mentally, "Freitas said. "He's been knocked down a few pegs. Hopefully that'll motivate him to come back and kick some butt."

UMass doesn't have any more scheduled meets until the New England's. Freitas said he is trying to find some.

Wrestlers from Hartford, Boston College, Boston University, Brown, New Hampshire and Maine will be in the way of Lee and his New England title and subsequent NCAA berth at the New Englands.

Lee said that he isn't thinking about transfering (because of the cuthacks), yet.

"The wrestling season isn't over and I want to concentrate on it," he said. "If I get a good offer I might think about it (leaving). If not, I'll stay at UMass."

Wants tennis returned

By PETER ABRAHAM

The petitions, letters and pleas are over for the University of Massachusetts men's tennis team captain John Sommerstein. He wants answers, fast.

When tennis fell by the wayside along with six other sports (women's tennis, wrestling and men's and women's skiing and golf), last May in a plan to make other sports, specifically football, basketball and lacrosse, more competitive by using the $75,000 saved, Sommerstein was shocked.

"They said they wanted winners, well without any kind of aid, not even a tuition waiver, we were real competitive and won (they were 5-4 last year and 8-2 the season prior) more than we lost," Sommerstein said.

The UMass trustees, over the summer, instituted a two year plan to fund the sports, but just for two years. After that they reduce to club status, which means no traveling, regional competitions, and a greatly reduced schedule.

Sommerstein, during the next meeting of the Athletic Council, a trustee's advisory board composed of seven students and eight administrators, will request that men's tennis remain a varsity sport.

"I am convinced that tennis is a viable sport, many people

Chairman examines resources

By JEFF BAKER
Collegian Correspondent

The newly appointed chairman of the state Natural Resource and Agriculture Committee visited the University of Massachusetts yesterday to familiarize himself with the environmental problems in western Massachusetts.

Chairman Steven Angelo discussed the problems of pollution at Quabbin Reservoir, marketing help for area farmers and the under-utilization of the UMass faculty by the Commonwealth with the faculty of the UMass forestry and wildlife department.

"The future is now," warned Angelo in reference to the pollution of Quabbin reservoir. "We have to worry about our groundwater today. The issue is very much alive in western Mass."

Angelo also plans to have the committee help farmers.

"Through direct marketing," he said, "we hope to make farming more profitable for the farmer. By taking away some of the middle men, farming will be more profitable for the small farmer.

"The committee on agriculture has been the weak sister and has not gotten enough attention (in the past)," Angelo said.

Angelo was appointed to the position on Jan. 7 by George Kevian at the Democratic caucus.

UMass forestry and wildlife chairman Donald L. Mader said that there was a common feeling among the UMass faculty that they were being under-utilized. They feel that they are competitive with private companies and that the state should take advantage of their services.

Angelo agreed saying, "They are more cost effective and that is definitely in the interests of the department."

Throughout the day each faculty member gave a presentation of their work to the new chairman. The highlight of the presentation was Jack Swelbery's film Home Free about the restoration of the bald eagle in western Mass. The film is scheduled to air on public television in March.

"It's an outstanding thrill to find something like the eagle restoration. It's really exciting," said Angelo.

Dorm fee proposal outlined

By DAVID SUMMERSBY
Collegian Staff

Members of Housing Services at the University of Massachusetts last night in a meeting with student government leaders outlined a new Residence Hall fee proposal that they say will benefit the entire UMass community for generations to come.

All students living in dormitories would be required to pay a $110 fee beginning next fall in addition to the annual bill for the formation of a new Capital Improvement Fund for long term renovations of existing facilities.

Executive Director of Housing Services, Joseph Zannini said the $110 fee would be put into a reserve fund to be used strictly for a variety of accumulated large scale and expensive building repairs and renovations. Unlike other state schools, UMass has never had a capital improvements fund and is now paying the consequences, Zannini said. Past renovations, he said were done hastily and on a "crisis level."

This $110 fee proposal comes in the wake of another proposal approved by the UMass Board of Trustees to establish a campus wide General Resource Fee of $261 that would refinance the University by consolidating various building debt services into one big debt service.

Under the terms of this general fee, annual housing fees would be reduced by $291 for on-campus students.

However, Housing Services, with this new situation (consolidation) that Zannini said "fell into our laps" wants to set aside badly needed reserves to prevent what he described is the gradual deterioration of the residence halls into actual "ghettos."

UMass professor attracts the media

By LISA BARNARD
Collegian Correspondent

A book on the United States response to the Holocaust written by a University of Massachusetts professor has generated extensive coverage by the national media.

History professor David S. Wyman, author of Abandonment of the Jews, has appeared on ABC's Nightline, NBC's Today Show, and has been featured in four articles in the New York Times. The book, which was released in mid-November, has already sold 15,000 copies.

Wyman said that the book is filtering down into "even the nooks and crannies of the country." He said that the response is unbelievable for a scholarly book, and that he cannot keep track of the reviews, which number about 50.

The book examines the U.S. reaction to the plight of the European Jews from 1941 to 1945. For 14 months after confirmation of the systematic annihilation of the Jews, the Roosevelt Administration failed to take action, the book says.

When the War Refugee Board was finally established, its power was drastically limited by insufficient funding, writes Wyman. Roosevelt allocated only $1 million, while Jewish groups raised $16 million for the rescue effort. U.S. Jewish organizations had little success mobilizing support without the backing of the media, the State Department, Congress, and Christian churches.

The atmosphere in the States at the time was markedly antisemitic and anti-immigration.

"Because of State Department administration policies only 21,000 refugees were allowed to enter the U.S. during the three and a half years...10 percent of the number that could have been legally admitted under the immigration quotas," Wyman writes. America, traditionally a haven for

Man pulls gun, two theft reports

A University of Massachusetts student allegedly threatened an Amherst man with a gun and verbally abused him at the scene of a car accident Wednesday afternoon, Hadley police said.

Police said the male student, 31, was involved in a minor car collision at the intersection of Route 9 and North Maple Street in Hadley. Then, he jumped out of his car, pulled out a handgun and threatened the other driver with it, police said.

The student then left the accident, which was observed by many witnesses. He was later arrested for assault with a dangerous weapon and leaving the scene of an accident. The student spent Wednesday night in Hampshire County jail and was arraigned yesterday morning in Northampton District Court.

Police said damage to the victim's car totalled $50.

UMass police action included:

- A pair of ski boots, valued at $229 was reported stolen Wednesday from an unlocked room on the fourth floor of Gorman dormitory. The theft was reported to have occurred sometime between Sunday evening and Monday afternoon.
- A $164 welfare check was reported lost or stolen from Lincoln Apartments Wednesday.

WORLD AND NATIONAL NEWS

Reagan does not impress Tip O'Neill

WASHINGTON (AP) — After weeks of holding his punches, House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. went on the attack again yesterday, dismissing President Reagan's State of the Union address as generalities of "a kindly old man."

The Massachusetts Democrat, in his harshest criticism since the president's landslide re-election victory last November, said Reagan "hasn't been honest with the American people. They haven't asked him for honesty."

O'Neill, 72, frequently characterized Reagan as "an old man" and "a kindly old man" at a news conference.

Reagan delivered his State of the Union address Wednesday night on his 74th birthday — a fact of which Congress took official note with a chorus of "Happy Birthday" at the end of the speech.

But yesterday, O'Neill said Democrats had been intentionally easy on the president in their initial reactions to his speech.

"We did not want to hurt this kindly old man that America loves on his 74th birthday," O'Neill said.

"This kindly gentleman, this old man. The American people are mesmerized by him. But I think he should come out and say what he's asking for."

O'Neill took issue with Reagan's assertion that current high deficits were caused by "nearly 50 years of government's living beyond its means."

"He made somewhat of a simple statement. It was very clever rhetoric. But it covered up the facts," O'Neill said. "Mr. President...do not point the finger at the distant past, when you yourself have so much responsibility for these deficits resting on your own shoulders."

When Reagan took office, O'Neill said, the national debt was just over $900 million. "By his own budget projections...the national debt will be $3 trillion when he leaves office, triple what it was when the Reagan revolution began."

O'Neill also accused the president of having "a touch in his heart" that makes him "unfair to the poor of America, to the blacks of America, and to other segments of America."

O'Neill, a sharp critic of Reagan during the president's first term, subdued his criticism of the president following Reagan's 49-state sweep. Last month, O'Neill openly praised Reagan as the "most popular" president he'd ever known and vowed to do nothing to block his program from coming to the House floor.

Police convicted in drowning of priest

TORUN, Poland (AP) - Three secret policemen were convicted yesterday of murdering a pro-Solidarity priest and given prison terms ranging up to 25 years. The fourth man in the case, a colonel found guilty of instigating the plot, was sentenced to 25 years.

Chief judge Artur Kujawa said Col. Adam Pietruszka, the highest-ranking Interior Ministry officer charged in the death of the Rev. Jerzy Popieluszko, played a "cynical" role and created "an atmosphere conducive to committing the crime."

Popieluszko was beaten to death and thrown into a reservoir last October.

There was a great public outcery over his murder, and the public trial of the four security agents was unprecedented in a country where secret police normally are beyond reproach.

The lawyer for Popieluszko's family called the verdicts "just," and a church spokesman said a 25-year-sentence gives a man "a lot of time to think about himself and about others."

The five-judge panel rejected the prosecutor's request that the ringleader, Capt. Grzegorz Piotrowski, 33, be sentenced to death by hanging.

Twenty-five years is the most severe punishment in Poland short of death, which was the maximum penalty faced by the defendants.

After serious illness, Chernenko speaks

MOSCOW(AP)— Soviet President Konstantin U. Chernenko, who has not been seen in public for nearly seven weeks, addressed the regular meeting of the ruling Politburo this week, the official news agency Tass said yesterday.

Tass did not say when the meeting occurred, but the Tass story was dated Thursday, the day that the Politburo normally meets.

The report that Chernenko spoke at the Politburo meeting came the same day that a journalist for the Communist Party newspaper Pravda, Vladimir V. Bolshakov, said publicly that Chernenko was sick and that his condition was "stable."

Chernenko, 73, has not been seen in public since Dec. 27, when television showed him at a Kremlin awards ceremony. Several developments since then have suggested that he was seriously ill.

Public funds bleak

SPRINGFIELD, (AP) - Higher Education Chancellor John Duff asked legislators yesterday to increase funding for the state's public colleges, saying that Gov. Michael S. Dukakis' proposed 1986 budget would put schools in a difficult position.

Dukakis has proposed spending $544.6 million for higher education in fiscal 1986, which begins July 1. That is an $86.7 million increase over the current funding level - but $122.2 million less than the state Board of Regents of Higher Education had requested.

Dukakis' budget bureau has agreed to request a $67.5 million supplemental budget in April for scholarship assistance and equipment purchases for engineering and nursing programs.

The regents also wanted $46 million for salary increases in collective bargaining agreements, but the governor cut that amount to $42 million.

Duff, testifying for the regents at a field hearing of the House Ways and Means Committee, declined to say what amount should be restored to the board's original request.

When Rep. James G. Collins, D-Amherst, asked the chancellor what would happen if the Legislature approved Dukakis' education budget without changes, Duff replied, "That would be a very bleak situation."

Collins asked Duff whether it was possible the state's public colleges and universities could make up the difference between the board's request and the governor's proposal.

"We cannot achieve what we need in this system through managerial efficiency," Duff said. He added that some compromise was possible, but declined to give Collins a specific figure.

In a prepared statement, Duff said Massachusetts has led the nation in increases in state appropriations for higher education over the past two years, with a gain of 36 percent.

"At the same time, it should be noted that Massachusetts still ranks only 30th among the 50 states in higher education appropriations per capita, and 39th in appropriations per dollar of personal income," Duff reminded them.

Three parishioners of St. Patrick's Church of Onalaska, Wisc. console each other after learning of the killings of three people in the church, including the pastor.

Pastor, two others, shot in Wisconsin church

ONALASKA, Wis. (AP) - A priest who was kneeling to pray was shot to death in a church along with two other men yesterday, and police arrested a man who called himself "Elijah" and said he objected to girls reading scripture during Mass.

Police Chief John Dloughy said a man wearing a yellow stocking cap and carrying a shotgun was captured by police as he ran from St. Patrick's Church after the shootings. He identified himself only as Elijah and said he was 29, police told reporters at the scene. He was taken to La Crosse County jail for questioning by District Attorney Scvot Horne.

The bodies of the Rev. John Rossiter, 64, and lay minister Ferdinand Roth Sr. were found in the Roman Catholic church's sanctuary shortly after a morning Mass. attended by children from a parish school next door.

Rossiter was shot just after he had hugged some of the children and they had returned to the school.

The school principal, Sister Rose Frances Phalin, said that after Rossiter and Roth were shot, the gunman went to the church basement where custodian William Hammes was slain.

Sister Phalin said that earlier, while the children were seated for Mass, the man had knocked at the sacristy door and asked Rossiter about plans to let two sixth-grade girls give the first and second readings.

She said he was quoted as demanding: "On what authority do you do this?"

The nun said Rossiter replied: "The pope told me I can do that, and that is good enough for me."

The man apparently left the church, but returned after the Mass.

"The children were out of the church, thank goodness," when shots were fired as Rossiter made a thanksgiving prayer in the sanctuary, Sister Phalen said.

Farm policy criticized

AUSTIN, Texas (AP) - President Reagan's plans to cut many farm programs is "economic genocide," that threatens a third of the nation's farmers with bankruptcy, says the Texas agriculture commissioner, who was a farm-policy adviser to Walter Mondale.

Reagan's plans, presented to Congress this week as part of his proposed federal budget, aim to cut, limit or eliminate price supports, income and loan subsidies, federal farm loans and many other farm programs.

The cuts, if adopted, would reduce federal outlays to agriculture by 37 percent.

BOG will fight for survival, board votes on task force

By V.A. SPAGNOLI
Collegian Staff

The Campus Center Board of Governors voted last night at its weekly meeting to form a task force to prevent the administration's proposed elimination of the BOG. The board also voted to hold an alternative beverage Valentine's Day dance in the Blue Wall.

The UMass administration voted Dec. 21 to eliminate the all-student BOG and replace it with a 16 member Auxiliary Services Board that would include students, faculty, staff and alumni.

Development and implementation of the activities of the task force will be revealed in the next two weeks, BOG chair Jane Donohue said last night.

Donohue will present a proposal next Wednesday that will include the BOG in plans to consolidate the Campus Center, Conference Services, and University Dining Commons trust funds.

Donohue will meet with Vice-Chancellor of Administration and Finance, John L. DeNyse and Vice-Chancellor Dennis L. Madson on Wednesday to discuss her proposal.

Donohue refused to talk about the specifics of her plan last night.

The BOG also announced plans for an alternative beverage Valentine's Day dance to be held at the Blue Wall next Thursday, Feb. 14. The band "Modern Plaids" will provide music and all drinks sold will be non-alcoholic.

"We are trying to save the Blue Wall from going under by appealing to underage groups," BOG coordinator Alex Zucker said. The dance begins at 8 p.m. and there will be a $1.50 cover charge.

"The essence (of the dance) is to find something else to do besides drink," Donohue said.

BOG members also discussed the hiring of four coordinator positions which are now vacant on the board staff. The deadline for applications is today at 4 p.m. Interviews for all four positions will be held Tuesday, and the positions will be filled by Thursday, according to BOG Vice-chair Karen-Karina Gray.

The four coordinator positions open are Governor's Program Council, University Store, Food Services and public relations.

Alcohol education workshop offered by Health Services

By Brian Thibeault
Collegian Correspondent

University Health Services will once again be offering a program intended to help students have healthier drinking habits.

Carlene Riccelli, educational director of Health Services and founder of the Student Opportunity Program (S.T.O.P.), said the program will begin March 11 and run from 6 to 7:30 p.m. at the Health Center. Riccelli said the program will consist of five workshops and two interviews. Students who cannot meet Monday nights can arrange a telephone class or take the program by appointment, Riccelli said.

She said that S.T.O.P. is part of a larger Alcohol Education Program in which students are trained in alcohol awareness.

"The general goal of the Alcohol Education Program is to promote responsible decisions and behaviors involving alcohol use," she said.

Riccelli said S.T.O.P. began about two years ago and is for students who have or think they may have an alcohol problem.

S.T.O.P. groups have about 8 to 10 students each and about 135 students have participated in the program. Staff for the program consists of one full-time professional, Riccelli, one half-time and one full-time graduate teaching assistant, and 20 peer alcohol educators (students), working for three academic credits.

Bill Cosgriff, who taught alcohol and drug education for the Springfield school system, will take Riccelli's place this year in leading S.T.O.P. Cosgriff expressed his approval of students working with their peers.

"I think the advantage of students being with others their own age is that they can identify with each other," Cosgriff said.

Riccelli said the program costs nothing for students who have paid their health fee, and that students' college records will not be tarnished by taking the course. Students can register at Health Services for the course.

"Participation in the S.T.O.P. program is completely confidential. No record is put in the student's medical record," she said. Students do not even have to use their last names.

Following an initial interview in which students will set goals to cut down drinking, there will be workshops. In these workshops, students will write drinking logs to keep track of their drinking. Students will keep logs throughout the program and derive an awareness of their drinking habits from the logs.

The fifth and final workshop is an evaluation session, where stidents will discuss their experiences. At this point, the group or individuals in the group, will decide whether to continue to meet. "It (the workshop) allows students to look at how they are using alcohol, what they like about alcohol, and what are the positive and negative consequences of their using alcohol," Riccelli said.

Late night hours added to PVTA runs, Amherst nightclub pays for free bus

By PAM MADNICK

The Pioneer Valley Transit Authority has extended its service until 2 a.m. Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights on most routes, and one Route 9 nightclub is offering free bus service on weekend nights.

The free bus service between Southwest and Central residential areas and the Changes discotheque begins tonight, Changes owner Michael Kane said.

The PVTA service was extended at the request of the Chancellor's Board on Alcohol Use and the UMass Transit Advisory Service, Al Byam, PVTA operations manager, said.

Kane said the Student Activities Office rejected a proposal Wednesday from Dickinson dormitory to sponsor the bus to Changes.

"I guess they (UMass Transit) and Student Activities feel the bus wouldn't be used for the right purpose," Duane DeValle, president of Dickinson dormitory, said. For the service to sponsor, it would have to be a dorm function offered weekly, he said.

The idea to offer free transportation to and from Changes was prompted by a marketing survey distributed by Changes to UMass students last semester, Kane said.

"I think it's a good idea. We've tried it a couple of times and it didn't work out," Bob Ross, manager of Justin Ryan's nightclub said.

The bus service will cost Changes $150 per night, Kane estimated.

The first bus will leave the Southwest horseshoe, near Coolidge, Moore and Emerson Dormitories at 9 p.m. on Fridays and Saturdays beginning tonight, Kane said. The second bus, at 9:30 p.m., will make pickup stops at Butterfield, Chadbourne and Dickinson Dormitories, he said.

A previous book by the author, Paper Walls: America and the Refugee Crisis, 1938-1941 began as a doctoral thesis project at Harvard in 1966. Wyman realized then that there was enough material for a second book. The actual writing of Abandonment of the Jews took four years, he said.

1982 Pulitzer Prize winner teaches Smith College course

By MICHELLE SEGALL
Collegian Staff

Although his office is empty, Tracy Kidder's mind is cluttered with thought.

The Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist is teaching a class at Smith College called "Writing about American Social Issues" in addition to completing a new book.

Kidder won the 1982 Pulitzer Prize in general non-fiction and the American Book Award for his book, The Soul of a New Machine.

The Soul of a New Machine traces the creation of a computer through the people that invented it. this humanistic approach to journalism has become Kidder's trademark.

Dubbed "literary journalism", Kidder's style turns complicated issues, like the building of a computer, into interesting and entertaining prose.

Kidder considers his teaching "a nice change of pace--not my profession." His class focuses on reporting and writing techniques, rather than particular issues and topics, he said.

Kidder wants to teach his students to see the world in an interesting way "not my way - in their own ways. You don't have to see the world the way the New York Times does," he said.

Author Tracy Kidder is teaching journalism at Smith this semester.

Kidder selected his 11 students after reading samples of their writing. "My fantasy is that I'll have some writers and that some of the women will be published," he said.

Kidder, 39, graduated from Harvard in 1967. After serving two years in the army, Kidder returned home from Vietnam in 1969. He received his Masters in creative writing from the University of Iowa's Writer's Workshop in 1974, the same year his first book, The Road to Yuba City was completed.

Kidder went on to write articles for Atlantic Monthly on tomics ranging from nuclear power to the development of Long Island real estate.

Now a contributing editor for the Atlantic Monthly, Kidder said he prefers book writing because, "You do so much research for so little space in magazine writing."

Kidder, who just completed another book which will be out in the fall, said he plans to take some time to relax. "I'm pretty tired," he said. The work, still untitled, deals with carpenters as they build a house.

Minority advisers now serve over 700

By DANIELA WATERMAN
Collegian Correspondent

The Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and Minority Students is an advising and advocacy service available to all students at the University of Massachusetts.

"Our goal is to help Third World students maximize their chance for success here at the University," CCEBMS Director Paul Barrows said. "We set out to help students develop confidence, motivation and direction."

CCEBMS, located in New Africa House, provides several important services primarily for minority students that include academic advising, serving as an advocate for students between faculty and the administration and working closely with the Admissions Office for recruiting Black and Third World students.

CCEBMS, in conjunction with the Bilingual Collegiate Program, also sponsors a summer program for incoming first-year students to introduce them to UMass and improve their mathematics and reading skills.

However the primary function of CCEBMS is to provide students with academic assistance. "The tutorial is the real meat of the program," Barrows said. All advising and tutorial services are available free of charge.

Along with a full-time staff of eight, and four part-time workers, CCEBMS employs more than 70 undergraduates who serve as tutors.

Founded in 1967 by black faculty members in response to the low percentage of minority students, CCEBMS now serves more than 700 black, Asian-American, Cape Verdean, Indian and Hispanic undergraduates.

"Over 90percent of all black students on campus are involved with CCEBMS to some degree," Barrows said. Last year 231 new first-year students joined CCEBMS, reflecting a steady increase in black and minority enrollment at the University as a whole.

First-year engineering major Viresh Patel, the CCEBMS student representative for the class of 1988, said CCEBMS is helpful to minority students because "it encourages us to go into professional programs such as engineering."

★ Fees

"There is a huge need for improvements on facilities and unfortunately we have not been putting money away over the years for them," Zannini said.

Student reaction was guarded and skeptical over why the fee had to be so high.

"We understand the obligation but it seems as if it is an awful lot," said Student Government Association co-President Rick Patrick. "I question this when you (Housing Services) are getting so much from refinancing," he said.

Under refinancing, the Housing System no longer must pay off a separate bond debt and will be receiving $171 out of $261 charged to students for the General Resources Fee.

The SGA is considering an alternative idea for the General Resource Fee that would keep debt service in the Housing system, which would generate more money for capital improvements.

According to Zannini's presentation, money in the trust fund would only go towards big projects like remodeling, reroofing, smoke alarms, insulation and carpeting. Most of the work could be done in the summer or during school at little inconvenience. However, the plan also calls for one residence hall each spring to be closed down. The students would have to be relocated.

All the work would be payed for by the new $110 fee, the new general resource fee and money issued by the state in Capital Outlay funds to be petitioned from the legislature. John R. Findley, Assistant director of Housing Services for Maintenance and Operations said the fund would amount to $49 million over ten years.

BLACK AFFAIRS

Forum to discuss lack of black news

By YADIRA A. BETANCES
Collegian Staff

In an effort to create a news vehicle for the Springfield Black community, a forum on the press in the Black community will be held at 10 a.m. tomorrow in building 17 of Springfield Technical Community College.

David Graham Du Bois, international journalist and visiting professor of journalism and Afro-American studies at the University of Massachusetts during the Spring semester, will deliver the keynote speech. Du Bois will be speaking on "communication in the community."

Among the topics to be discussed in the forum will be "Movers and the shakers of the news; a traditional view of the press and how altered is the information you receive," led by Michael Thelwell of the Afro-American studies department at UMass and John C. Walter of Smith's Afro-American studies department.

The second panel will discuss, "community news-the truth in the message- if you could choose what type of information you want..." led by Du Bois and Susan Williams, a professional in all avenues of the media.

The third panel will provide people with the basic tools and procedures for the creation of a news vehicle. Leading this panel will be Ralph Julian Simmons, staff assistant for the Wall Street Journal and Robert Brown Hasan, publisher of the Progressive Woman Magazine in Boston.

Carmen Ceita Jones, director of St. John's Innercity Center, sponsors of the forum, said the Springfield Black community is not covered as "adequately...or as in-depth as we would like to see it," by the mainstream presses of the area, "and that is putting it mildly," she said.

As a result, Jones said they hope to get a "large block of people interested in developing a news source" for the 25,219 Black residents. Springfield's total population is 152,319.

She said several Black presses have emerged in the city, but they have been a "one man operation" and have not survived long. A box lunch will be available for the small cost of $1. per person.

Savage Gallery to be rededicated

By YADIRA BETANCES
Collegian Staff

A first time community exhibit of Augusta Savage's sculptures, along with a lecture by her only pupil and other ceremonial rites will highlight a rededication ceremony of the Augusta Savage Memorial Gallery at 3 p.m. on Sunday in the New Africa House at the University of Massachusetts.

The gallery stemmed out of a cultural center created in 1969. In the mid-1970s, the Black Cultural Center was given its present title. Savage was an eminent Black sculptress who gained fame for immortalizing the heritage and struggles of Blacks.

Marilyn E., director of the gallery, said she is excited about the rededication not only because there will be someone who can talk personally about Savage, but also because it will be the first time the gallery will have an exhibit of Savage's art.

Murcie Poplar Lavender, Savage's pupil, is a painter, sculptor, writer, designer, children's book illustrator and an art teacher in the Gary, Indiana public school system. Some of Lavender's work will also be on display.

Although there are other galleries on campus which have showings of Black and Third World artists, Marilyn said the gallery serves to provide a wider sope which is excluded from mainstream society. She said the gallery is "a resource and a vehicle for Black and Third World artists on a continuous basis."

For example, it is very difficult to find any resource material on Afro-American artists, and especially on Afro-American women artists

That is why Marilyn is happy the gallery is named after Savage, "traditionally, women in art are ignored...we do not exist." But she is also in love with her work because of the opportunity it brings to "support the knowledge that Black and Third World people are talented and multi-faceted human beings."

"Art is a basic level of understanding of other communities and cultures," she said, "is historically preserving a culture."

Maurice Poplar Lavender, Augusta Savage's only pupil will lead the rededication ceremony of the gallery at 3 p.m. on Sunday at the New Africa House.

Unlike written history, Marilyn said art can not be lost, betrayed nor altered. "It's understandable...it elicits responses," she said.

Art is also more expressive than the written word for it provides an instant connection between peoples of color, she said. "No matter what historical event it was that happened, art maintains it without a form of direct communication."

Marilyn hopes that in the future Black and Third World art is "appreciated, acknowledged and respected for what it is - fine art."

Wheatley : Black poet pioneer

By YADIRA BETANCES
Collegian Staff

To many, Phillis Wheatley was the first Black, and the second woman to publish a book of poems in the United States.

To others, she was like many before and after her, the epitome of Black struggle in North America.

Wheatley was born in Africa in 1754. She was sold seven years later in Boston to the Wheatley family. She instantly become the favorite of the family. She wasn't allowed to talk to the other servants nor did she do menial chores.

The Wheatleys helped Phillis broaden her horizons by providing her with an education, unlike other slaves of the time.

She wrote her first poem in 1767 to the University of Cambridge. The poem scolded rebellious college boys and warned them to stay away from sin and follow Christ.

She continued to write about issues of morality, American values as well as various poems honoring and mourning the births and deaths of Boston's wealthy class.

Wheatley's first published poem, "An Elegiac Poem on the Death of George Whitefield," propelled her quickly into international fame.

But it was not until she began to write as a Black person that her fans began to disappear.

In 1774, Susannah Wheatley, Phillis's mistress, died and her death was the beginning of a new era in Phillis's life. Years later, she married John Peters. She bore three children, who died. Peters was thrown in jail for debts.

Phillis then acquired a self-awareness as a black person and began to write about love and a need for freedom. This poetry was never published.

When June Jordan was here early this week, she said that she judged a poetry contest in Indianapolis where the terms used were related to the nature of life and "no one was addressing the black issues of 84." But she respected the works for their worth.

She said if the case had been the opposite where a white person was judging black writing, it might have been rejected for being too political or too insensitive. But she added, "as long as we remain children of slavery, we will be loved, sheltered and praised, but not otherwise."

Black History

As part of Black History Month, Black Affairs will have a series highlighting the achievements and accomplishments of Black men and women who have, in our context excelled in history.

Benjamin Banneker was the most famous Black American of the Revolutionary Period of American history. As a scholar and a scientist, he was always seeking answers and/or ways of predicting answers to questions.

He invented a clock, was the editor of an almanac and had his scientific papers read in the European capitals. He was chosen by President Jefferson to aid in the development of plans for Washington, D.C. He and a close friend chose the site for the White House.

He was born a free man and he had the right to vote. Banneker was known and respected in this country and in Europe; yet, by 1803 his right to vote was taken away from him and all other free Black Americans, in his native state of Maryland.

Letters to the Editor

Angered by cartoon

Monday under a letter to the Editor in the Collegian about the harassment of a woman by some fraternity members was a cartoon I find very degrading to women.

Why does a woman's sexuality have to be the focus of so much of men's attention? Women are not functional body parts; they are human beings with the right to integrity and dignity. This cartoon is no joke. Not only does this type of cartoon not belong in a newspaper which represents a college student body which claims to be "aware," but by its juxtaposition next to Karen Pollens' letter you have demeaned the value of her words. You have acted no more respectful than the men who harassed her.

Women's words have too long been put down and silenced. I am infuriated when the newspaper which represents the student body voice, to which I belong, continues in old ways of oppression. I expect a more thorough editing from the Collegian staff, with an ear and eye to liberation and respect for all peoples.

Hiding the truth?

The film being shown in the Campus Center today, A Clockwork Orange, by Stanley Kubrick, is being sponsored by the UMass Republican Club. That means that any profits made by the film will fund that group's activities.

We noted that posters advertising the film did not inform us that the Republicans were sponsoring it. The table tents in the DCs did include this information, but on the underside, where most students wouldn't see it.

We do not intend to have our money end up in the hands of the UMass Republican Club and we felt that students who choose to attend the film should know where their money is going.

Sorry for 'oversight'

The UMass Republican Club is sponsoring the movie Clockwork Orange this Friday in the Campus Center. Our posters do not indicate the event's sponsor. We apologize for the oversight.

The violence portrayed in this film has been received with some controversy. We feel the high caliber of the film as demonstrated by its awards of "Best Film," and "Best Director," overide other concerns. Afterall, we are all fortunate enough to live in a country where we can pick and choose our forms of entertainment.

Clean it or leave it

I direct this letter to the person(s) who spray painted all those political slogans on the walls of Herter, the Campus Center, and wherever else your stinking, small time hoodlum tactics brought you. I really resent your defacing the grounds of my school (I'm giving you the benefit of the doubt in hoping you're not actually a student here). You haven't swayed my political ideals to the left, to the right, or even caused me to think about politics to any degree. Now that you've shown the world just how much common sense you have, I can only imagine that you don't have enough intelligence to hold any political opinions at all. I wish I could have been walking by you when you started your expensive mess so I could rub your lousy nose in it. Why don't you do something really worthwhile and go clean it up? Otherwise, get outta town and thanks for nothin'.

Jobs is the key to the future

Although many of you reading this might not like it, history will probably refer to the 1980s as the Ronald Reagan decade; eight (if time is on his side) years when sweeping changes were made in the United States of America. One of the key issues which won the 1984 election for Reagan was his boldness in using supply-side economics. During the campaign, the Democrat-run House of Representatives put a key issue of supply-side on the back burner because it was politically touchy. I am talking about urban enterprise zoning.

An enterprise zone is designed to lift the poor out of poverty by giving tax credit to big businesses which have put money into impoverished neighborhoods. Tax credits would not be given until the money was spent in the neighborhoods. This would promote new industry in these areas, which in turn would promote employment. It is a bold proposal which is in direct contrast to the costly handout policies of the past, which in the long-run, enslave the poor to the government by allowing it to control their income.

This essential of supply-side economics benefits the entire country; nobody is hurt by it. Social programs which give money to those who want to work, but cannot, is merely eyewash for a very large problem. Equal opportunity for all cannot be achieved when jobs are not available for those who are left out. This is not to say that all social programs are useless, because they are not, but if something better is found for a large portion of people, then why not make use of it? Enterprise zones are just that.

Let us all hope that when Congress is done squabbling over the budget, this sweeping change will be swiftly enacted. Getting millions of less fortunate Americans into jobs that they thought would never come will be one major victory for America during the Ronald Reagan decade.

OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

A time and a place for sharing ideas

Stephen C. Erickson

Last semester there was a good deal of talk on the right to freedom of speech on campus. As Chancelor Duffey has pointed out, the abridgement of one's freedom of speech is strictly against University regulations. Nevertheless, the five-college area in general, and UMass specifically, has a dubious record with regards to free speech. Former Vice President Humphrey, branded a warmonger by some students during the war in Vietnam, was unable to address UMass. Jeane Kirkpatrick, the U.N. ambassador, was discouraged from speaking at the Smith College commencement due to threats. Last year, a group of UMass radicals totally disrupted an event that featured a member of the Contra Force currently fighting the Sandinistas in Nicaragua. Political intolerance was prevalent in the past presidential election at UMass as well. The consequences of such actions are sad reflections on our University and serve as frightening commentary on our society's future, if we are to be the leaders of tomorrow.

The UMass community places enormous emphasis on prevention of social persecution, which, if not taken to extremes, is a good thing. The maintenance of a free exchange of ideas, however, is paramount, even above our social concerns. If we [illegible] ideas to be silenced, then we are asking for tyrants to [illegible] over us, which would make social oppression all the more of a threat.

John Stuart Mill had some very thoughtful things to say about the exchange of ideas, and his essay, "On Liberty," is unsurpassed in its argument for such beliefs. About the freedom of expression, Mill says, "But the peculiar evil of silencing the expression of an opinion is, that it is robbing the human race, posterity, as well as existing generation; those who dissent from the opinion, still more than those who hold it. If the opinion is right, they are deprived of the opportunity of exchanging error for truth: if wrong, they lose, what is almost as great a benefit, the clearer perception and livelier impression of truth, produced by its collision with error." For those who claim the righteousness of their argument warrants the suppression of opposition, Mill points out that majorities in past generations "held many opinions now known to be erroneous, and did or approved numerous things which no one will now justify."

The political arguments that do exist at UMass are also largely deserving of criticism for their intemperate style. Again, quoting Mill, "The worst offense of this kind which can be committed by a polemic is to stigmatize those who hold contrary opinion as bad and immoral men." This crime is committed on the pages of the Collegian every day. Also, the thrust of the "peace" movement implies that those who prefer deterrence to unilateral disarmament do not desire peace.

College should be first and foremost a place and a time of learning. Soft hearts must not lead to soft minds, namely closed ones. Objectivity in politics is a lofty goal, but we must strive for it if we hope to better our world. Such objectivity begins with a willingness to listen.

Fundamentalism: 'a dirty word' here

Rusty Denton

It would be hard to imagine someone with more enemies at UMass than Ronald Reagan, but let us not forget Jerry Falwell. Falwell is the pointman for the "religion-in-politics" movement; he takes all the grief for unpopular positions, breaking ground for those who follow. Although even arch-conservatives welcome him with reserve, Falwell is seen by fundamentalists as a progressive, religious, political leader – something like Martin Luther King, Jr. It makes you wonder who would believe that, doesn't it?

Technically, fundamentalism is a Christian sect known for their literalism in interpreting the Bible. Politically speaking, anything enthusiastically biblical is under the fundamentalist umbrella. Not every so-called "fundamentalist" is a disciple of Falwell, but there is general agreement on several issues.

Like all Christians, fundamentalists believe that individuals can have a personal relationship with God only through Jesus Christ, who alone bought a purging from sin for believers with his death and returning from the dead. Also like other Christians, they believe their sole purpose in life is to please the God they now know until Jesus comes again, this time as king and creator.

Obviously, someone who thinks this way will be pretty fearless in politics. Yet, even with the strong political heritage of the early American church, politics was avoided as a dirty, worldly profession by fundamentalists during the last 50 years. That has changed for two reasons.

The first reason is the deterioration of the American family. The family is divinely ordained in the Bible. But in the last 30 years, federal and state governments have licensed divorce, homosexuality, and abortion (and even prostitution in one state), all of which undermine traditional family values. Also, many public schools encourage children to make their religious, social and sexual decisions independently of their parents, yet the long-standing right of parents to keep their children home for schooling is being challenged. Many families are broken, and millions have deep emotional scars as a result of disposable families. The fundamentalists blame themselves for it, because they were not involved in the politics that made it happen.

Another reason churches are back in politics is that many believe God deals with a nation according to its righteousness, and they believe God has struck America "repeatedly and unrelentingly" in this generation. For instance, the Supreme Court decisions on school prayer and abortion are cited as national acts punished by God. Fundamentalists point out that the 1963 school prayer prohibition was followed by JFK's assassination, race riots, the debasing of the dollar, the drug problem and accelerating crime rate. The 1973 abortion decision, fundamentalists say, was followed by the energy crisis, Watergate, America's first military defeat, crises in the auto and steel industries and growing unemployment. They say earthquakes, a volcanic eruption, severe droughts, devastating fires, inflation and recession are evidence of supernatural displeasure with a rebellious populace.

Clearly, their issues are centered around having the nation please God. Liberals have condemned this, accusing fundamentalists of trying to legislate morality. Fundamentalists retort that liberals try to legislate morality based on the sanctity of godless "human potential." That has a ring of truth to it. Liberal zeal for "humanity" borders on the religious: few things outrage liberals so much as a group more evangelistic than themselves. Seeing that UMass is such a liberal Camelot, it isn't surprising that fundamentalism is a dirty word around here.

Letters to the Editor

Proposed fee impractical

The University Administration has really asked for trouble this time. Requesting that off-campus students pay a fee that supports not only the athletic facilities (which many people already do not wish to pay) transit, and the Campus Center, but also supports the dining commons and residence halls is going to be a great incentive for students to both stay on campus and also move back, thus producing even more overcrowding then already exists in the residence halls.

No matter how justified the administration is in changing the fee system, they have the wrong reasons for doing so. First, claiming that students are not 'disenfranchised' (I did not know that I was franchised) is ridiculous. One may always refuse citizenship to a given organization or group.

Second, Littlefield claims that this will encourage the 3,000 students eligible to move off campus, to stay. This is true, but it is not a problem, if it were, students would not be living in the Campus Center Hotel waiting for on-campus housing.

Third, Graduate Student Senate President Sanjiv Duval explains that the University fee would enable the surplus revenue from different buildings to be combined to accomodate renovations to needy buildings. I do not know of any dormitories that end up with surplus money, but if they did, they should not. Presently in McNamara, we are taking cold showers because the University has not taken action to fix the problem (thus producing the illusion of no money). Needless to say, our showers worked fine last semester.

Clearly, the administration has given all the wrong reasons for charging such a fee. The arguments merely support why we should not combine these fees into one mandatory fee. If the administration continues to support this philosophy and succeeds in charging all students this fee, they had better be prepared to build an entire living area, and dining common (we could call it "Middlesex") to support the increase of on-campus students.

Aaaaaarrrrgh, not again!

Enough already! What is all of this hooplah intended to accomplish anyway? Maybe we should start asking our dates what they prefer so that we can plan the evening accordingly, or better yet why doesn't everyone wear signs stating their preference. This will go over very well at social gatherings, don't you think?

It seems as though 'sex' and tenderness can no longer occur simultaneously. Simply calling sex 'The Act' makes it sound alien. Is there somewhere that I can buy tickets to this performance?

Placement service reveals demands

By ILENE GARBER
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Placement Service (UPS) provides counseling and placement to graduating seniors who participate in their on-campus recruitment program.

In previous years, UPS has placed 55 to 60 percent of the candidates involved in their program.

"Placement for the graduating class of 1985 looks promising, considering the national percentage of recruitment was so low two years ago, due to cutbacks," said Arthur Hilson, director of the University Placement Service.

"Seventy-five to 80 percent of those students who seek employment have a job six months after graduation. However, all of this cannot be attributed to the service, because some find jobs through referrals and personal contacts," Hilson said.

In order to set up interviews on campus, seniors must open a credential file with UPS. The file includes three recommendations that will be sent out at any given time. UPS also issues a monthly career newsletter to inform students of recruitment news. The newsletter is available in the Whitmore Administration Building and UPS office.

"At this time the easiest student to place is a female, bilingual, computer programmer, due to the demands of that field. The hardest to place is a journalism or communications study major without experience. That student is involved in a Catch-22. No one will hire anyone without experience, but without a job that student won't get experience," Hilson said.

The University Placement Center recently moved to a new location in Fraternity-Sorority Park. The Board of Trustees financed the $225,000 building; money for maintenance, furniture, and carpeting was supplied by alumni, according to Hilson.

Hilson said that the UPS is petitioning for a shuttle service to bring students from campus to the Placement Center.

Lung cancer prevails

NEW YORK (AP) — Lung cancer will surpass breast cancer as the leading cancer killer of women this year, the American Cancer Society said Thursday, and the group urged feminists and the federal government to push for restrictions on cigarette advertising.

The society projects that lung cancer will kill 38,600 women this year, 200 more than breast cancer. Dr. Robert McKenna, the society's national president, said at a press conference that at least 75 percent of lung cancer cases in women are linked to cigarette smoking.

Survey uncovers frequent drug users

BOSTON (AP) - Alcohol and drug use by Massachusetts high school students goes far beyond a group of teen-agers who use the substances on a one-time or experimental basis, according to new research by state public health officials.

A detailed analysis of an earlier survey of 5,000 Bay State high schoolers found a core group of youngsters who use drugs and alcohol habitually and with potential adverse health effects, officials said yesterday.

The study was scheduled to be released Friday when Gov. Michael S. Dukakis holds a meeting with educators from 65 school districts as part of his Alliance Against Drugs. The general findings were released in December when Dukakis first launched the anti-drug campaign.

"When we looked at students who use alcohol or drugs, we expected that the much higher percentage would be infrequent users," said Thomas Salmon, director of the Division of Drug Rehabilitation in the state Department of Public Health, who supervised the breakdown of the data.

"What our data tended to show, whether you look at the lifetime, annual or current use, was a really different picture - the percentage of students who used it infrequently was outweighed by those students using drugs at a higher level of frequency," he said Thursday.

Salmon said a core group of high frequency users was found for most of substances studied in the survey. For example:

-While 64 percent of the 12th graders polled said they had not used marijuana or hashish in the preceding month, 10.8 percent said they experimented with it only once or twice.

★ Church shootings

After the shooting, a kitchen worker ran to the school to call police and another kitchen employee hid in a closet, she said.

Authorities said Rossiter and Roth were shot from behind.

"They are all dead. They blasted their heads off," assistant La Crosse County medical examiner Michael Watunya said.

In her announcement to students over the school's loudspeaker system, Sister Phalin said: "Father Rossiter is not with us any more. A maniac came in the church this morning and did some shooting. Say a prayer for these good people. It's terrible; it's a tragedy."

CINEMASCOOP
by Count Ramin Zahed

Last week, I received many obscene phone calls and hate letters for praising the goddess Nastassja Kinski's acting abilities. My mom threatened to stop sending me my anti-baldness vitamins soaked naturally in Vidal Sassoon Mousse. The lady at Whitmore, in her discreet state of jealousy, had me enrolled for a painful course of Avant-Garde Film. O.K. O.K., I repent. I did get carried away, and I was far from objective. Yet, you have to admit that Klaus Kinski is a very lucky father. I hope this satisfies Miss Ellen Rhino from Northampton.

The notorious Nastassia before her maternal days.

Enough of these trivialities. I'm beginning to get really excited about the Academy Awards. Every year, the ceremonies disappoint and bore us to death; but, we still keep on watching. At this point I'm panicking. I can't decide whether The Killing Fields or Places in the Heart deserves to be best picture. I certainly hope Peggy Ashford wins best actress for her mystical Mrs. Moore in A Passage to India. The best actor award is likely to be given to Haing Ngor for The Killing Fields but I would love to see F. Murray Smith win for his brilliant portrayal of Salieri in Amadeus. More Oscar talk next week.

Mrs. Soffel, the new Diane Keaton/Mel Gibson film opens at the Dead Mall (Mt. Farm Cinemas) today. The story is about the obsessive love affair of a prison warden's wife with one of the prisoners and their doomed aftermath. Personally I found the film a bit too gothic and saturated with cinematic cliches. However I was disgusted by the fact that my older married sister was drooling over Mel Gibson. Gillian Armstrong, the woman who directed the fantastic My Brilliant Career went a bit too soft over Mel and that's probably why the film doesn't have the panache of her earlier works.

Weekend Winner: At the Dead Mall, premieres the latest film by Australian director Peter Weir. He is the talented man behind such great classics like Picnic at Hanging Rock and The Year of Living Dangerously. Critics have admired this work in which Harrison Ford plays a tough Philadelphia police captain who falls for a widow whose son is the sole witness to a police slaying. The film is aptly titled Witness.

One of the greatest discoveries of last year was a very funny Stranger than Paradise. The film is hilarious in its low-key humor and especially in its charming moments with an old grumbling Hungarian hag. A definite must if you are like into hip movies, man. Risk a trip to Northampton and see the film at Pleasant Street Theatre.

By the way, in the tradition of the Orson Welles Cinema in Boston, the Amherst Cinema is putting on a great science fiction marathon next Saturday for 24 hours. They will show such classics like The War of the Worlds and Barbarella among other gems.

Killer Question: You really made me proud last week. The Jetson's maid was Rosie the dynamic robot. Of course she was not the first metallic maid. Richie Rich was another spoiled brat who had a maid called Irona.

Timothy Hutton stars in Turk 182!, a Twentieth Century Fox Release, as a young man who redeems his brother's reputation.

Anyway, the intelligent people who got it right were Thomas Harrington, Joan MacDonald, Bob Andrews, and Alan Hunter. Tom got the package, gang, but thanks a lot for trying. This week's question concerns Timothy Hutton. Well, years ago Timmy had a dad who was a star of a popular television show. Be the first to drop the name of the show (with the time of day) in my mailbox at the Collegian and you will win a glossy picture of Timothy Hutton. That's all, folks.

The Killing Fields moving

By HERB RAMY & MATT MACHERA
Collegian Staff

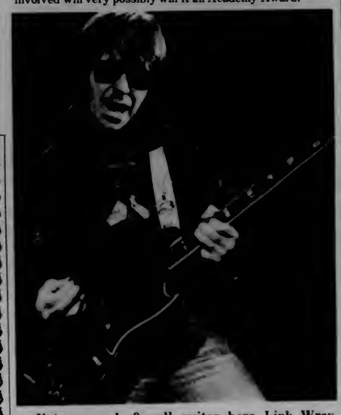
Director Roland Joffe has created an extraordinary film in The Killing Fields. In an era where simplistic pictures have become all too commonplace, The Killing Fields forces you to think and feel along with the major characters.

This story focuses on New York Times reporter Sidney Schanberg and his interpreter Dith Pran as they cover Cambodia in the final days of the American withdrawal. The bond of friendship displayed by these two characters is amazing considering the setting where the story takes place. The movie's most climatic point occurs when the two main characters are separated and Sidney returns to New York while Pran is sent to a prison camp because of his ties with the West. From here the picture follows both men's lives while separated from each other.

Although the movie was excellent in every way, two of its aspects truly stand out. These are its acting and its graphic portrayal of how lives were shattered by the tragedy in Cambodia. In describing the acting, Sidney, played by Sam Waterston, did an outstanding job as a newspaper reporter who is torn between getting the story out and really caring about the people around him. Haing S. Ngor as Dith Pran was no less impressive as the interpreter who sees his homeland going up in flames. Their performances in this film were so strong that it was as if you were watching a documentary rather than a feature film.

Although this movie couldn't be described as gory, its scenes of death were very powerful. Without them, this wouldn't have been half the picture that it was.

The Killing Fields, succeeds on every level in which a motion picture could hope to. Its depiction of a world-shaking event from the point of view of two of the people involved will very possibly win it an Academy Award.



Veteran rock & roll guitar hero Link Wray finished his first American tour in five years last weekend at the Rusty Nail. Although heavy snowfall discouraged some, a dedicated following showed up to hear the legendary guitarist perform. Playing a battered Gibson SG equipped with hand wound pickups and whammy bar, Wray demonstrated his mastery of feedback and power chords. Accompanied by Keith Lentin on bass and Marty Feier on drums, the trio cranked out an energetic performance that left all hungry for more.

Dougherty tied for first on the pommel horse, receiving a 9.3 and 9.05 respectively. Ronayne's vault was a handspring front somersault off the horse, a very difficult maneuver which, when done without flaw, receives a 9.4. Well deserved bonus points for virtuosity (traveling over 3 meters before landing) were robbed from Ronayne, which resulted in discrepency over his score.

For UMass, Phil Gorgone placed first on the floor exercise with a 9.05. Dave Sherman again took first on the still rings after two consecutive meets with a 9.0. Junior Joe DeMarco took first on the parallel bars with an 8.7. On the high bar, Tony Sbarra received an impressive 9.3, to tie Ronayne for the high score for UMass.

In the all-around was freshman Roberto Weil taking first for the Minutemen with a total of 52.1. DeMarco was second with a 51.75, and freshman Rick Rourke third with a 45.25.

Also this weekend, the UMass women's gymnastics team will host two meets at Boyden Gym. Today, the women face Springfield at 7 p.m.

Sunday will see three teams, North Carolina State, Temple and Vermont in a quad-meet starting at noon.

The women's swim team, and specifically freestyler Liz Fienberg, face a challenge when they travel to the University of New Hampshire on Saturday.

Fienberg, undefeated this season in individual competition, is one of the best 200 freestylers in New England but will be fought by a tough Wildcat team. The UMass women are 2-8 overall.

Payback time for UMass

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

It's revenge time for the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team when they travel to Penn State for an Atlantic 10 conference game Saturday night.

The Nittany Lions, last in the A-10, upset UMass 71-65 in overtime, catching the Minutemen with a little overconfidence.

"It'll be a whole different story with them this time," UMass coach Ron Gerlufsen said. "We underestimated them and lost a game we shouldn't have lost. We have our troubles on the road, so any road win is a good one, but this one would be better than most."

UMass beat the Lions in State College last season to snap a long winless streak on the road. Under second-year coach Bruce Parkhill, the inexperienced Lions have had troubles, but have also improved— as evidenced by the Springfield result.

Guard Craig Collins and forward Dwight Gibson are the main scoring threats. Freshman Jim Newcomer, a 6-10 center, hurt UMass with a streak of seven points that gave PSU their first lead in the second half.

Ware's Carl Chrabascz, a 6-8 forward, has given PSU rebounding help.

UMass was led by Bobby Braun's 16 points and 12 rebounds in the loss. Horace Neysmith has 14 points and eight rebounds with Carl Smith scoring 15. The slumping Donald Russell had only seven. Lorenzo Sutton added ten.

"We'll have to play tough defense, like what has been winning us games to beat them," Gerlufsen explained. "It's pretty simple, we have to play to our potential and not overlook them again. We should've learned our lesson."

"We have a definite thought towards paying them back," Smith said. "We don't want to lose to them again."

Study Medicine in ISRAEL

Touro College will prepare you to earn an M.D. in Israel from one of the world's great universities – Technion-Israel Institute of Technology

Touro College, through its Center for Biomedical Education, and the Technion Faculty of Medicine, offer an intensive program leading to the M.D. degree. If you are a qualified student who has completed the traditional pre-med requirements, you may receive a second baccalaureate degree from Touro, and an M.D. from the Technion, after a total of four years plus one year of advanced clinical rotations in Israel.

Initially, you'll spend 18 months at the beautiful Huntington, Long Island, New York campus of Touro College. Courses include advanced sciences and intensive study of Hebrew.

Following successful completion of the Touro phase, you become eligible for advanced standing at the Technion Faculty of Medicine in Israel, where you will satisfy the 32 months of study at medical school required for licensure in the United States. You must successfully complete a bridging program, to be accepted for clinical studies, then submit a thesis and take advanced rotations before receiving the M.D. degree.

Applications are now being accepted for the third entering class. For applications and information call or write:

Women bear with Maine in regional tilt Sunday

Inside play key for Minutewomen

By ED HAYWARD
Collegian Staff

In the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team's last game they suffered a surprising 66-57 loss to a Dartmouth College team with a tough inside game. UMass coach Barbara Stevens hopes her team learned from that defeat as the Minutewomen host a team with a similar style to that of Dartmouth, the University of Maine.

"They're having a very good season," Stevens said of the 13-4 Maine team. "They have good size so they are an inside oriented team. They will be the same as Dartmouth. After facing this type of team maybe we have learned something. In the last game we just did not execute."

Despite 17 point efforts from Karen Fitzgerald and Tara Lewis the Minutewomen lost after a 40 percent showing at the foul line and some sloppy play resulting in several turnovers late in the contest.

The Maine program has undergone a positive transformation in the past two years, Stevens said. The coach credits this change to second year Maine coach Peter Gavit.

"I heard they used to be an undisciplined team. But now they are a scrappy and physical team that plays hard," Stevens said.

"The key for us is to play tougher defense than we played against Dartmouth and to play with greater intensity. In our last game our intensity was not what I had hoped it would be. We gave them too many uncontested shots and their stronger players were getting the ball in their areas," Stevens said.

UMass will depend on guards Barbara Hebel and Lewis from the outside. But it will be up to 6'1" Sue Burtoft, 5'10" Jerrie Bernier, and Fitzgerald, a 6'2" center, to control the boards for UMass and offset Maine's powerful inside game. Stevens also said UMass will need strong help off the bench.

UMass' Susan Burtoft (40) and Karen Damminger (22) go for the rebound against Boston University last Saturday. The women host Maine on Sunday at Amherst College at 1 p.m.

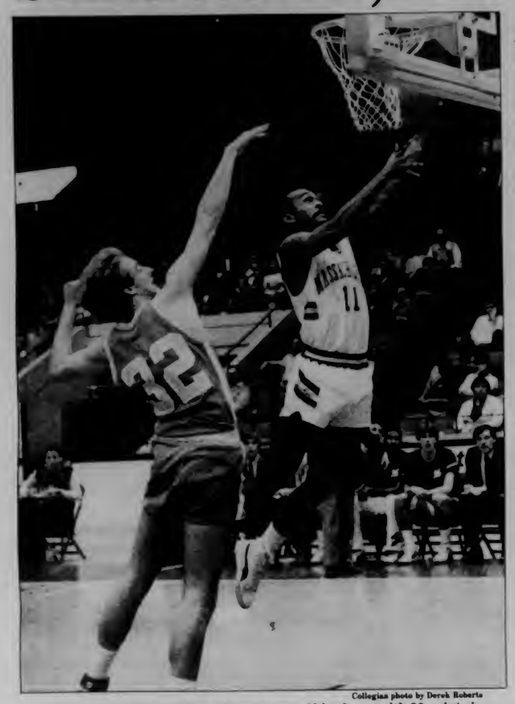
Smith seals it, UMass wins 59-56

Russell (20) and Braun (16) star as Minutemen go to 10-10, 6-5



Collegian photo by Derek Roberts

UMass guard Donald Russell broke out of his slump with 20 points in a 59-56 victory at St. Bonaventure.

By STEVE COOPERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

ST. BONAVENTURE, N.Y.—Carl Smith hit two pressure free throws in the final 1:17 to lift the University of Massachusetts to a big 59-56 victory over St. Bonaventure last night.

The Minutemen go to 10-10 overall and 5-6 in the Atlantic 10. The victory was the first in three tries at the Riley Center and came before 3,513 loud fans.

St. Bonnie, 4-7 in the league, cut what had been a 16 point UMass lead to one, 55-54 as Rob Samuels hit his eighth straight point with two minutes to go in the game.

Smith was fouled with 1:17 to go and calmly dropped both free throws before Matt Ryan fouled Doug Turner and the Bonnie guard made both of his shots to make it 57-56.

The Bonnies got the ball back as Ryan lost a pass with 50 seconds remaining. Alvin Lott missed a jumper that Horace Neysmith rebounded.

Smith took the ball, was fouled by Turner, and with 14 seconds left made both foul shots. The Bonnies were short on a three pointer as the Minutemen took an important victory.

"We won because we stayed together and showed some spirit," UMass co-captain Donald Russell said. "This was a really big win for us."

"I'm not at all surprised at what Smith did," UMass coach Ron Gerlufsen said. "He's an excellent player and proved it again. He's great when it counts."

For UMass, Russell had 20 points, 14 in the first half. Bobby Braun had 16, 10 in the second half. Smith had seven and Lorenzo Sutton six. Ryan came off the bench to score six first half points.

St. Bonaventure was led by Samuels with 16, including his 1,000th career point. High-scoring senior center Barry Mungar did play but was held to only six points by a tough 2-3 UMass zone defense.

Russell sparked UMass to a 33-26 halftime lead as the 6-1 guard broke out of his shooting slum in style.

With the score tied at 10, Russell hit a jumper and followed with a three-pointer.

Mike Hunt hit for the Bonnies before Russell converted on a three pointer to make it 18-12. Ryan hit a jumper followed by Smith conversion of a three point play.

Ryan nailed two more jumpers that gave UMass a 27-12 lead and a 12-0 run.

The Bonnies fought back and cut the halftime lead to seven on a Turner jumper as the crowd got into the game.

UMass experienced early second half trouble as Pat Allen's shot cut the lead to two, 36-34. Russell hit two free throws that made it 39-35 before Braun took control.

The 6-6 forward hit two foul shots, and a layup to give UMass a 43-35 advantage. Sutton then hit before Braun made two straight three-point plays to give UMass a 51-40 lead.

Samuels then made his presence felt, scoring eight straight to make it 55-54 and set up Smith's clutch performance.

In the game, UMass shot a much-improved 16-of-21 from the line (76 percent) and 21-of-46 from the floor. Neysmith had 11 rebounds and Braun six.

The win gives UMass a much-needed lift to start a three-game road trip with stops at Penn State and St. Joseph's remaining. The win also proves that the Minutemen can win without Neysmith scoring a lot of points, something they been able to accomplish.

Swimmers wind-down with NH, women gymnasts also at home

The University of Massachusetts men's swim team will be looking to keep its five meet win streak alive when they host the University of New Hampshire Saturday at Boyden.

"We've beaten them consistently in the past, but only by a few points the past few seasons," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said. "It should be a good meet."

The Minutemen, 6-2, will be trying to qualify as many swimmers as possible for the upcoming New England championships (February 28 at Springfield College).

"The guys will be resting up for these meets to try and get their times to New England standards," Yarworth said.

Iowa transfers Craig Fuller and Drew Donavon have shattered numerous pool and school records for the Minutemen this season and may be the key to a possible New England title.

On Monday, cross-town rivals Amherst College host the Minutemen. The Atlantic 10 championships and New Englands follow.

The UMass men's track team will be at Maine's Colby College for the indoor Eastern Conference Championship on Saturday.

The Ken O'Brien-coached Minutemen hope to better their fourth place finish last season when they trailed Southern Connecticut, Lowell and Maine. They rebounded outdoors with a second place finish and hope to take the next step tomorrow.

"We have a lot of people in a lot of events with no one athlete looking like a sure bet than any other," O'Brien said. "We have good balance in a lot of events, especially the middle and long distances."

In the mile, Paul Stanislawzyk and Jan Novak, cross country standouts for UMass, will be among the favorites.

The two mile will see John Pannaccione and Wayne Levy going for the Minutemen.

Three freshmen will run the 1,000. Steve Tolley, who O'Brien termed one of this season's surprises, Bill Stewart and Jeff MacIntosh have what O'Brien called "good chances to place highly."

The 400 will see sprint standout and school 300 record holder Rayle Crichlow going for UMass. The 600 goes to Eric Winer and Ted White with Todd Johnson taking on the high hurdles.

O'Brien also said the relay teams (mile, two mile and distance medley) all have solid chances to score points.

In the field events, Johnson, a pentathlete, will long jump along with triple jump specialist Ferdie Adoboe. Neil Martin hopes to better his sixth place finish last year (outdoors) in the shot put.

The UMass men's gymnastic's team, now 4-3, travel to upstate New York to face SUNY-Cortland on Saturday. "Cortland has had injuries recently," UMass coach Roy Johnson said, "but previously have done very well. Maybe they're ready — I don't know what to expect."

Last Tuesday UMass lost to Southern Connecticut 267.4 to 255.4.

It was an unfortunate meet for the men, although freshman Jay Ronayne did place first in vaulting, and co-captain Ken

Conte will push new acid rain bill

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Staff

Congressman Silvio O. Conte (R-Pittsfield) Friday announced the re-introduction in the House of Representatives of acid rain legislation he is co-sponsoring.

The new acid rain bill, which was presented to Congress Thursday, calls for a 16 million-ton reduction of sulfer dioxide and nitrogen oxide emissions in the U.S. over 10 years, Conte said at a press conference in the Graduate Research Center.

Other sponsors of the new bill include Congressmen Edward Markey and Edward Boland of Massachusetts, James M. Jeffords of Vermont, James Oberstar of Minnesota, and Frank Horton of New York, Conte said.

Funding for the plan, which will cost about $5.5 billion a year, will be partially provided by a surcharge on electricity by consumers. States that produce greater amounts of hazardous emmisons will have a higher surcharge than those who pollute less, Conte said.

"Lakes, streams, and reservoirs across the state are already dead and our forests are now seriously threatened by the effects of acid rain," he said. "Even more disturbing, there are recent reports pointing to potential health risks caused by the acidification of our environment."

Paul J. Godfrey, director of the Water Resources Research Center at UMass which has been researching the effects of acid rain , said the total emissions reductions specified in the bill "will be enough to protect most of our water resources in New England.

The 16 million-ton reduction will amount to a 50 percent overall emmisions reduction in the next 10 years, he said.

Despite the failure of a similar bill introduced to Congress last year, Conte said that he thinks this new acid rain legislation will pass.

Conte said it will be easier to get the bill through Congress this year because the economy is stronger, there is an increasing national awareness of acid rain problems, and the bill allows a surcharge exemption for low-income consumers.

Three UMass professors to direct radio observatory

By SIOBHAN MASTERSON
Collegian Correspondent

The Five College Radio Astronomy Observatory, which has one of the world's largest telescopes, has appointed three University of Massachusetts professors to direct its operations.

William Irvine, a UMass astronomy professor, is the director of the facility, and will supervise the observatory's staff of 40.

F. Peter Schloerb, of the physics department, will be the associate director in charge of the computer systems, and Peter Goldsmith of the astronomy department will also be an associate director, responsible for the technical aspects of the observatory's operation.

The observatory is studying interstellar molecules in other galaxies. It has conducted "the most extensive studies of molecules in other galaxies in the world," Irvine said.

The observatory collaborates with others all over the world, including China, the Soviet Union and India, he said.

Among its other accomplishments are the discovery of two interstellar molecules called C3H and C3, and the charting of "most detailed map of the distribution of clouds of gas in our own galaxy," Irvine said.

Schloerb and Irvine are also members of the International Halley's Comet Radio Watch. "Man has been observing comets for more than 3,000 years but we still don't know what the comet's composition is," Irvine said.

"The observatory's elaborate radio telescope is capable of detecting the unknown molecules in the nucleus of the comet. Halley's comet will become continually more active beginning in the fall and the new information will be published for astronomers and observatories around the world," he said.

Schloerb is also involved in a group project to develop a telescope similar to the observatory's for placement on a spacecraft. The astronomers hope it will be on a craft headed for Mars in 1990. With the radio telescope, they would be able to map the distribution of water on Mars.

Body discovered near Hadley mall

A 19-year-old man was found dead behind the Hampshire Mall Friday, Hadley Police said.

The man reportedly died of exposure. Police would not confirm or deny radio reports that an empty wine bottle was found near him.

State police said yesterday that a special plainclothes detec. unit working out of Hampshire District C .rt in Northampton has been investigating the death, but no one from the unit was available to report on the investigation's progress.

Students meet with Keverian

By JOEL P. COFFIDIS
Collegian Staff

BOSTON-Public university students representing the State Student Association of Massachusetts met with Massachusetts House Speaker George Keverian Friday morning to discuss student representation on the state Board of Regents of Higher Education.

About 20 SSAM members attended the 11 a.m. meeting in the speakers State House office. The meeting, which lasted 10 minutes, served to introduce SSAM to Keverian, said SSAM Chairman Barry Wray. Wray, a UMass student, is the delegate representing Umass for the parent organization.

SSAM President Steven Barros, a delegate from Roxbury Community College, explained the association's goals to Keverian.

"We like to look at ourselves as watchdogs for higher education," Barros said.

Barros told Keverian that the main concern for the association right now is working on the legislation that will add a student voice to the Board of Regents.

Keverian said the association should send him a letter with a list of additional concerns. He added, "I won't make any committments because I don't do that, but I'll follow it along."

Keverian said SSAM is doing its job very well and he added that success would follow if things were done the right way.

"Be calm, reasonable, polite and follow up with calls," Keverian said.

Barros said the meeting with Keverian opened up communication that "will help us in the future." He added, "Our whole aim is to lobby for the students."

Wray, a junior engineering major, said that as a delegate from UMass, he travels to the State House about every other week to lobby.

He said the association is a "collective of students, kind of an all-for-one, one-for-all cooperative that is trying to maintain low-cost, high quality higher education in Massachusetts."

Wray said the association fights for increased financial aid. In the last two years, financial aid increases in Massachusetts have been higher than in most other states, he said.

"Financial aid is up five million dollars in the governor's proposed budget," Wray said. "You've got to get more funds and more faculty because our school is nothing without good faculty," he added.

Wray said it is important to have a student member on the Board of Regents because the board "governs general higher education."

The association at UMass is funded as a registered student organization, but it receives no other local funding.

"We're going to be running a referendum to ask the students if they want to maintain their membership with SSAM with a one-dollar fee," Wray said.

UMass students overwhelmingly approved the fee two years ago, but it was cancelled due to problems in how the funding would operate. These problems have been ironed out and Martin Nofio, a delegate for Springfield Technical Community College, is heading up the writing of the referendum.

Famine victims kidnapped

GENEVA, Switzerland (AP) The International Committee of the Red Cross said yesterday that "armed elements" abducted about 250 famine victims from an emergency feeding center and it then suspended food distribution at the camp.

It issued a press release saying the Ethiopian government had told Red Cross representatives that "the regular forces had no responsibility for the incident" Tuesday at the camp in Mekelle, the capital of northern Tigre province.

Rebels seeking autonomy for Tigre have been fighting government troops in the province for years, and some Western relief organizations have accused the government of blocking relief supplies to areas held by the insurgents.

The Red Cross statement said the agency suspended food distribution at Mekelle the same day that "armed elements...stopped the distribution and took away about 250 men." All Red Cross activities in the other areas of the drought-stricken country are continuing, it said.

Polish sailors presumed dead

One survivor in North Sea tragedy

BREMEN, West Germany (AP) — The search for missing sailors from a Polish freighter that sank in the frigid North Sea was abandoned by West German rescuers yesterday, with only one member of the ship's 25-man crew found alive.

Gale-force winds and a blinding snowstorm forced rescuers to suspend a 14-hour search Saturday after they recovered the bodies of nine seamen from the Polish freighter Bielsko Zdroj and rescued the ship's radio officer from a drifting lifeboat.

"We will not be resuming rescue operations," an official at the West German Society for Ships in Distress, the private agency that coordinated the North Sea search, said yesterday.

"The weather is still bad and after all this time the situation looks hopeless for those missing," the official, who asked not to be identified, said in a telephone interview.

Officials at the Bremen-based agency said the 1,171-ton ship sank within 15 minutes Friday when its cargo of steel shifted during a severe winter storm, causing the ship to roll over in the North Sea some 100 miles off the West German coast.

If the death toll is confirmed at 24, it would be the worst disaster in the history of Polish shipping, according to a shipping official in Warsaw.

Americans fault Korean govt. and request delay of summit

SEOUL, South Korea (AP)—Two congressmen and other U.S. supporters of Kim Daejung detailed rough treatment they said was meted out to the Kim party on its arrival and asked President Reagan yesterday to put off the U.S.-South Korean summit.

They accused Korean authorities of "inexcusable use of force" Friday at Kimpo International Airport in Seoul and said one congressman, Thomas Foglietta, and a former U.S. ambassador were thrown to the floor.

The Americans charged in a statement that the government of President Chun Doo-hwan "broke its promise to our government that the return of Kim Daejung would be 'trouble-free.'"

It was issues by Rep. Edward Feighan, D-Ohio; Rep. Foglietta, D-Pa.; Robert White, the former U.S. Ambassador to El Salvador, and others in the 22-member group who escorted the opposition politician back to Seoul four days before tomorrow's scheduled elections for the National Assembly.

Kim, 59, was returning from two years of self-imposed exile in the United States.

Kim and his wife were dragged away from their U.S. escorts by police and shoved into an elevator after landing at Kimpo airport Friday. Some of the Americans accompanying Kim said they were shoved to the ground or beaten by police in the fracas.

"Given this calculated affront to the American government and people," yesterday's statement said, "we recommend that the White House give serious consideration to the postponement" of Chun's visit to Washington.

Administration officials in Washington said the incident would not cause cancellation of Reagan's invitation to Chun to visit the White House in April. The Seoul government has acknowledged that police shoved members of Kim's party but denied officers indulged in "punching and beating," and accused Kim of assaulting policemen and his own bodyguard.

Most of the U.S. delegation visited Kim's home yesterday evening for a religious service and dinner, but police refused to allow a Korean priest in to lead the worshipers, Kim told The Associated Press at his home.

Kim said police have told him he cannot leave his home. Authorities denied that Kim, who still faces a prison term stemming from a conviction on sedition charges in 1980, is under house arrest and said he is under police "protection."

S.African rejects government offer

SOWETO, South Africa (AP) — Nelson Mandela's daughter said yesterday the long-imprisoned black leader has rejected the white-minority government's offer of conditional release with the words: "I cannot sell my birthright, nor am I prepared to sell the birthright of the people, to be free..."

Zinzi Mandela quoted from a statement she said her father gave to her mother, Winnie, on Friday when Mrs. Mandela visited him at Pollsmoor prison near Cape Town. It was Mandela's first public statement since he was jailed for life in 1964 for planning sabotage.

Mandela, who was president of the outlawed African National Congress when he was arrested, said he could not accept freedom while the congress remained banned and unable to take part in the debate on the nation's future.

In Pretoria, the Prisons Department spokesman, Maj. Abri van Vuuren, said two political prisoners serving life sentences with Mandela had accepted President Pieter W. Botha's offer for release.

Last month, Botha told Parliament that Mandela and others jailed with him could go free if they renounced violence as a tool to end apartheid, the government's institutionalized racial separation policies. Van Vuuren said the names of those who had accepted would not be disclosed until they were released, which he said would be "soon."

Hub residents voice concern over drug battles in Roxbury

BOSTON (AP) — Residents met with Mayor Raymond L. Flynn and top police officials over the weekend as authorities continued to investigate what they say is a deadly battle between rival drug dealers in the city's Roxbury and Dorchester sections.

One resident told the officials that Roxbury has become "the wastebasket of Boston, like Harlem...or Watts."

No arrests have been made in connection with the drug war, which police have linked to seven shootings, three of them fatal. A Boston woman is recovering after being shot in the face Wednesday when she got caught in the middle of a shootout between gang members.

The battle is believed to be related to issues of territory and the lucrative street trade in heroin and cocaine, police said.

Police said they have been stopping cars of all known area drug dealers and are maintaining a stepped-up, around-the-clock presence in Dorchester's Grove Hall neighborhood.

Louis Elisa, one of about 20 residents who spoke to city officials saturday, told Flynn before the meeting started, "If you count three deaths, we count nine. This shootout was foretold six months ago. The residents of Roxbury do not want drugs, and we're here to say we're going to work with you."

Police say they believe fighting is between a New York based gang called "The Apples" and a gang known as "The Naked City."

Deputy Police Superintendent John E. Barry, who heads the homocide unit, said the Naked City gang is based in Boston, although others have said it has Detroit connections.
